He was twenty-three years of age when he confronted the more practical duties and the wider problems of life. All before had been training and preparation, the best of both, and his marvelous career ended before he was fifty. Few have crowded such great results and acquired such lasting fame in so short a life. Few have done so much for the country and for civilization as he whom we honor to-day, stricken down as he was when scarce at the meridian of his powers. He did not flash forth as a meteor; he rose with measured and stately step over rough paths and through years of rugged work. He earned his passage to every preferment. He was tried and tested at every step in his pathway of progress. He produced his passport at every gateway to opportunity and glory.

His broad and benevolent nature made him the friend of all mankind. He loved the young men of the country and drew them to him by the thoughtful concern with which he regarded them. He was generous in his helpfulness to all, and to his encouragement and words of cheer many are indebted for much of their success in life. In personal character he was clean and without reproach. As a citizen, he loved his country and her institutions and was proud of her progress and prosperity. As a scholar and a man of letters, he took high rank. As an orator, he was exceptionally strong and gifted. As a soldier, he stood abreast with the bravest and best of the citizen soldiery of the Republic. As a legislator, his most enduring testimonial will be found in the records of Congress and the statutes of his country. As President, he displayed moderation and wisdom, with executive ability, which gave the highest assurances of a most honored and successful administration.

On the 19th day of December, 1876, the State of Massachusetts presented the statues of John Winthrop and Samuel Adams, as her offerings to Memorial Hall. On that interesting occasion General Garfield said:

> As from time to time our venerable and beautiful hall has been peopled with the statues of the elect of the States, it has seemed to me that a third House was being organized within the walls of the Capitol, a House whose members have received their high credentials at the hands of history and whose term of office will outlast the ages. Year by year we see the elect of their country in eloquent silence taking their places in the American Pantheon, bringing within its sacred circle the wealth of those immortal memories which made their lives illustrious. And year by year that august assembly is teaching a deeper and grander lesson to all who serve their brief hour in these more ephemeral Houses of Congress. And now two places of great honor have just been most nobly filled.

Mr. Speaker, another place of great honor we fill to-day. Nobly and worthily is it filled. Garfield, whose eloquent words I have just pronounced, has joined Winthrop and Adams and the other illustrious ones, as one of "the elect of the States," peopling yonder venerable and beautiful hall. He receives his high credentials from the hands of the State which has withheld from him none of her honors, and history will ratify the choice. We add another to the immortal membership. Another enters "the sacred circle." In silent eloquence from the "American Pantheon" another speaks, whose life-work, with its treasures of wisdom, its wealth of achievement, its great work wrought, and its priceless memories will remain to us and our descendants a legacy, forever and forever.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I now yield to my colleague, Judge GEDDES.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Speaker, it was in 1864 that Congress invited each State of the Union to erect statues in the Old Hall of the House of Representatives of two of its most eminent citizens. In pursuance of this, many of the States have accepted the privilege, and now, by the action of the General Assembly of Ohio, a marble statue of James A. Garfield has been presented to Congress as the first contribution by that State. This selection will, I am certain, meet with universal, heartfelt approval.

In the few moments allowed me in accepting this token of the sentiment of my State it is not my purpose to give a biographical sketch or even to outline the life-work of him whose memory so richly deserves this recognition.

As a work of art I find it highly commended, and most forcibly by that close observer and well-known writer, "Gath," as follows:

> I had not seen the new statue of Garfield, sent by the State of Ohio to the Hall of Representatives, until to-day. I thought it was one of the best statues that has been presented to the Capitol. I could realize the man with whom I have often walked and talked to the life, or as well as white marble can embody man. There are no accessories of this statue which take the eye away from the head and face and expression. He has at his left hand a little bracket, on which is the paper of his notes or manuscript, and, holding this, he speaks, and all who want to see him as he lived in life, hearty and high and broad, can look at him there as he was until the assassin, with the spitefulness of a backbiter, fired into the citadel of his life.

Although we often met, my political views contributed in part to deprive me of the privilege and honor of a more intimate personal acquaintance with him, but could not and did not prevent an appreciation of his virtues, and admiration of his typical American character.

My first substantial knowledge of him was when he was engaged in raising volunteers for the regiment which he subsequently commanded as colonel. Many of the men were raised from the families and firesides of those with whom I was well acquainted.

On an occasion of a reunion of that regiment held at Ashland, Ohio, in 1880, we met. He was before the people at that time as the Republican candidate for the Presidency, and I was invited to speak from the same stand, although I was then the Democratic candidate for Congress. The occasion was intended to be non-partisan. An incident occurred at that time that might lead a superstitious person to regard as a premonition of the sad and tragic death he subsequently suffered. During the time he was speaking, the platform on which he stood fell several feet to the ground, but unmoved by the accident he continued his address to the multitude assembled to hear him.

I now distinctly recall the heartfelt earnestness with which I congratulated the people on the honor conferred upon us all by the presence of our illustrious citizen who had addressed them, and then congratulated him on the honor paid him by the presence of so many thousands of our people.

Early in my Congressional experience I was deeply impressed with the wonderful intellectual storehouse he had at his command for every emergency. Let me give you an illustration:

On the 13th of January, 1815, Congress bought 6,700 volumes of Thomas Jefferson's library, a well preserved collection of books, constituting the basis of the present Government Library, and will be found to be among the richest intellectual treasures of the world. This collection of books, so indispensable to every American statesman, I found was familiar to him.

I had the honor to present to this House from the Library Committee a proposition in the interest of our national Library, which I urged in a few words in my humble way, and, meeting with opposition that alarmed me, our lamented late President unexpectedly came to my rescue in words so pertinent, as matter of argument and so precious as his personal sentiments, that I now quote them from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 9, 1879. He said:

We are here under circumstances where, without the slighest regard for party, we ought all to vie with each other in being proud of that great Library and doing anything in the world that is reasonable to maintain it and render it more effective.

Let us remember that the foundation of that Library was laid in the small library of Thomas Jefferson, and the spirit of scholarship and thoroughness that he showed in the care of his own books, which are still preserved in the Library as a monument of his learning and wisdom, seems to have been secured in the management of the Congressional Library itself. Perhaps gentlemen may not know that every one of the large body of books obtained from Thomas Jefferson, to form the foundation of this Library, has his own mark at some distinct page away over in the book indicating his ownership.

I recollect to have seen a little thing which is worthy of mention here. In one of these books, when it came here, there happened to be left a little piece of paper not more than five inches square, in Mr. Jefferson's handwriting. He had kept during the eight years of his Presidency this curious memorandum. He had drawn it off in the form of a table, with the year at the head, a column for each year, and the date of appearance of vegetables in the Washington market—in 1801, on such a date, asparagus, and so on through, showing that in the midst of great affairs, when President of the United States, he took care of little things. These little observations marked him as a philosopher.

Mr. Speaker, this gift from the State of Ohio is to be deposited in the old Chamber occupied by the members of the lower House of Congress prior to the 16th of December, 1857, but now dedicated as a depository of the statues of American citizens most distinguished in civil or military life.

How appropriate the place. As the citizens from all portions of our beloved country enter this Capitol building they find it in keeping with the genius and spirit of our form of government. They find its chief beauty and most imposing qualities consisting in its exhibition of strength, plainness, and durability. It at once demands and receives the closest attention and earnest admiration of every lover of our Republican simplicity.

As you pass from either branch of Congress to the other this room is on the line, and in passing through it you never fail to observe the large number of visitors charmed by the scene. Not only the statues that attract, charm, and force the admiration of all who pause and think, but the memories that cluster around every object and bring fresh to mind the memorable scenes in the history of that hall all unite to constrain you to feel that you are in the presence of objects rendered sacred by their history. These objects—statues of our great and good men from the colonial period down to the present—will, I trust, unite to prove that—

No sound is breathed so potent to coerce
And to conciliate as their names who dare
For that sweet mother-land which gave them birth
Nobly to do, nobly to die. Their names,
Graven on memorial columns, are a song
Heard in the future; few, but more than wall
And rampart, their examples reach a hand
Far thro' all years, and everywhere they meet
And kindle generous purpose, and the strength
To mold it into action pure as theirs.

But these statues are not to all the most impressive and inspiriting associations to be found in this old hall. The heart and mind are soon filled with thoughts of the glowing, thrilling eloquence, undying patriotism, and stern, immovable integrity that characterized the lives of many connected with that old hall whose statues are not there. They too have enduring monuments. Their life-work forms the grandest, most magnificent, and enduring of all monuments. Such lives speak in trumpet tones to all nations, for all nations, and for all time to come. "Though dead they yet speak."

And is he dead whose glorious mind
Lifts thine on high?
To live in hearts we leave behind
Is not to die.

Although the gift and reception of this statue of our noble dead, the lamented late President, is the performance of a holy work of love, a patriotic and sacred duty, yet we should be led to look beyond the work of art and take fresh inspiration from the heroic deeds performed in civil or military life.

The highest, noblest, and best quality in a nation is gratitude, without which it would soon fall an easy prey to either violence or corruption. Our nation has always manifested in the most conspicuous ways its unstinted gratitude to the men who founded the Government, who conceived and formulated the great principles upon which our institutions rest, or who have done most in civil or military life to maintain and preserve them.

No nation can forget or neglect its benefactors and illustrious public servants and be itself worthy of admiration. It must itself liberally shower just rewards on all who serve with fidelity its truest and highest interests in war or peace.

In accepting and enjoying the priceless and glorious results which the distinguished dead of our country achieved on land and sea, we must accord to their memories the most hearty and generous recognition.

One favorite form of expression of the patriotic gratitude of this generation is to erect monuments. Constitutional liberty, vindicated by the pen or sword on the judicial bench or battlefield, or in the halls of legislation, we find honored in monuments and statuary in all parts of the nation's capital.

These exhibitions of our appreciation of the heroic virtues, glorious deeds, incorruptible purity, exalted patriotism, and self-sacrificing devotion to duty will secure to the present and coming generations the same qualities to guide, mold, and govern the destiny of this mighty Republic.

Herein lies our greatest security against every form of danger. The ancient Roman gloried in the security afforded him by the declaration: "I am a Roman citizen." It secured him personal safety throughout the known world. But it was an insecure privilege. Fear of physical power—mere brutal force—was his only guarantee of safety.

Not so with an American. To be able to say "I am an American citizen" commands the respect and love of all classes throughout the civilized world. It is therefore a great privilege to belong to a country that can present to the world so many striking and illustrious examples of the ennobling and elevating power of free institutions.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I now yield to my colleague, Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Ohio has placed in this Capitol a statue of James A. Garfield. It is a gift by the people of that State to the nation. A resolution accepting the gift has passed the Senate and now waits the action of this House. Before the final vote is taken I desire to speak for a few moments of the dead after whose living likeness the marble statue is fashioned.

It seems but yesterday that Garfield stood in our midst, a leader of his party and a teacher of the people. He was a leader on this floor—not by virtue of those qualities that made Clay and Stevens great and successful parliamentary leaders. They sought the right as Garfield did, but their imperious wills brooked no opposition and tolerated no hesitation in the ranks of the column at the head of which they marched. They led, if might be, and forced, if necessary, the column forward as the exigency of the hour demanded or seemed to them to demand.

In this Garfield differed from those two great leaders. In forensic eloquence he was the equal of Clay and superior to Stevens. He was more than the peer of either in ripe scholarship, was a more profound thinker, and had a wider range of experience in the midst of those great events which test the metal of statesmen and soldiers and try the strength of governmental institutions and shape the course and fix the destiny of nations.

Few men were better equipped in matter of mental furnishings for parliamentary debate and party leadership. He always led the column, he never forced it forward. No one questioned the accuracy of his learning or doubted the integrity of his purpose.

His strength as a leader was due to his unswerving love of right, and his unmatched ability in satisfying candid minds that he sought with singleness of purpose ways which wisdom commended and truth and justice approved. In the great conflict of principles mere expedients to dodge or delay an issue found no favor with him.

Truth is eternal, and her time is now. He recognized that in all life's labors duty is ours, results are God's. He despised demagogy, and had little patience with those who seek exaltation by that ladder of corrupt ambition. He loved his fellow-men. He never learned to hate even the meanest of mankind.

The one weakness in his leadership was that howsoever he condemned the act, his great unguarded kindness, unasked, forgave the actor. His head won vantage ground, his heart not unfrequently surrendered.

In his judgments of men mercy so tempered justice as often to destroy that needful quality. This controlling love of his fellow-men would tend to make him better fit in times of public peril to write the law than to be the agent of its execution. He would have hailed with delight a dispensation that would from punishment have divorced all pain and left to just judgment no quality but mercy. Of the great attributes of his kindly heart, nothing manifested itself more grandly than the tender and constant love he bore his mother.

I heard and saw him first, more than twenty years ago. In the speech he made all hearts were moved by the splendid tribute that he paid to her.

When unsought the people of his State chose him for United States Senator, his friends in this city were pleased to tender him a serenade. On that occasion one of the speakers pronounced some words of well-deserved praise of Garfield's mother. A moment afterward Garfield approached the speaker and, unobserved of others, placed his arm about his neck, and with voice choked by emotion, and eyes wet with tears, he said: "God bless you for the good things you said about my mother."

On his inauguration, when the oath that made him Chief Magistrate of this great nation had been taken, he turned amidst that vast waiting multitude and bending down to her he kissed his aged mother. Malicious envy called this acting. How little such "critics" knew the heart of that great man.

By that act of reverent filial piety he touched the hearts of this nation. They knew what great emotions wrought him in that hour and in that presence to bear witness to what a mother's love and care had done, could do, for a home and for a people.

He was credulous and confiding as a child, and gave his confidence almost without reserve, and seemed to deem a betrayal of that confidence impossible.

Lincoln and Garfield were essentially of the people, in the widest and best sense of that term. Both were born in low estate. Both were freedom's apostles and humanity's friends.

Inscrutible Providence that so ordained that these two, of all men most near the people, most actively in sympathy with them, at once their friend and champion, should in all the line of rulers have been singled out by the assassins as victims of their bloody work, and be by these ministers of crime cut down in the very flower of their usefulness!

While the life and character of Garfield may challenge closest scrutiny, it is not urged that he was free from human faults and frailties. He stood conspicuously prominent among his fellow-men, while his adversaries were hidden by their own obscurity.

> The moon being clouded presently is missed,
> But little stars can hide them when they list;
> Gnats are not noted wheresoe'er they fly,
> But eagles gazed upon by every eye.

So his whole course of life was noted.

To find a fault in him was justly to accuse the party led by him. To baffle him was to halt the column at the head of which he marched. To hide his prominence was impossible. To curb or destroy his influence was the aim of those who felt and feared his power. His countrymen had learned to love his precepts and to walk in the light of his example.

The record of his life was to his fellow-countrymen at once a benediction and an inspiration. While they loved and honored him, they were in the last degree exacting. With unwonted eagerness they searched his life to find, if such there was, a single stain or touch of taint, and were the while indifferent to gross lapses on the part of those who had attained to eminence, good or bad, by means that would have hurled Garfield from the pedestal of popular favor into well-deserved contempt.

But it is always so.

> The greatest scandal waits on greatest State.
> The crow may bathe her coal-black wing in mire,
> And unperceived fly with the filth away;
> But should the like the snow-white swan desire,
> The stain upon his silver down would stay.

Garfield could not be pushed into nor find obscurity, nor his life-service in the interest of his countrymen be forgotten.

His nomination for the Presidency was not the accident of the distempered time nor the result of mere manipulation of rival factions. There is abundant witness, that in the wildest tumult of that stormy contest the master's voice was heard, and, yielding to its stern command, the convention confirmed the people's choice. His defeat was impossible in the absence of some means to take away the support of a people's confidence and love, yielded to uphold him, and which the struggling millions of our land gave willingly, and which made him strong for his labors.

> Unworthy as was the end, the means were worse—
> Forgery, the fruit and coinage of one base mind.

The destruction of a hecatomb of men the nation might and would survive, and possibly forgive, but willfully to misdirect and trample down the people's will and by chicane defeat them in their choice has no fellow in the annals of dangerous example, and can only well up from a depravity that is indifferent alike to every sense of patriotic duty.

Against the assault that comes in open day and seeks by means heroic, however wicked, prudent foresight may provide. But what human agency can protect this nation against the all-destroying poison injected into the healthful current of public thought and private judgment by some living, breathing source of foul contagion which infects the very life-blood of our governmental system.

The desperate purpose of a desperate man was too soon conceived, and, though well planned, miscarred in its execution. And though to the humble homes throughout the land, on wings of lightning that corrupting agent flew, yet, thank Heaven, in that wild race of right with wrong God's truth o'ertook the speeding falsehood and bore it to the earth, and at once restored to Garfield's fame the shield and armor of his spotless life.

The offerings from the people of well-earned confidence were but for a moment interrupted. The heart that beat for all his race had not been false to the burden-bearers from whose ranks he came. The arm that had struck and only struck for their disenthrallment had not been raised against them. The voice that had spoken, the pen that had written for their ennobling had not been suborned to base betrayal of a single trust.

Loved by his countrymen as only Lincoln was; trusted by his countrymen as only Lincoln was, by means only less infamous and by a man only less depraved than he who struck down Lincoln, Garfield fell; but he is not lost to this people.

Garfield is in his shroud and tomb, but in this nation he is mighty yet. His utterances and his example will outlast the earthly monuments fashioned to make his name immortal. His grave will be the patriot's shrine; his life and character be an inspiration to the lovers of freedom throughout the world. The fathers of this land will seek his footsteps and our children learn of him. He has taught our youth to rise to exalted station by wise and virtuous action. He has taught them that the highway to eminence and worthy renown leads not alone from palaces, nor yet along the paths of luxury, but that it finds its way alike from the abode of poverty and the home of wealth.

It will go ill with this Republic when such lives are forgotten and the influence of such examples is unheeded. [Applause.]

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I now move that the House concur in the Senate resolutions.

Mr. SYMES. Before the question is put I ask unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] be allowed to address it on these resolutions. To my knowledge Mr. PETTIBONE was a pupil of the distinguished statesman whose memory we are now honoring when he taught school in the State of Ohio and has always been one of his great admirers. I know the House will be glad to listen to his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee be allowed to address the House on the pending resolutions.

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTIBONE. In addition to what has been said by the eloquent sons of Ohio in admiration and commendation of the character of our late President, whose marble image is to-day received by the House of Representatives, I shall have but little to add. And, Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say that it is because it so happens that one of the earliest teachers with whom I had the privilege of studying the classics and preparing for college was the late President Garfield. I knew in early life his complete and utter devotion as a teacher. He taught not merely at Hiram, but he taught always in the whole course of his life; not only in Ohio, but in this forum; and all who heard him knew that he was a model teacher.

He loved to teach. His wide-minded character and his yearning for his fellow-men expanded itself in every variety of way.

If, Mr. Speaker, there was any one trait in the character of General Garfield more predominant than another it was his great kindliness, his universal charity, his love for humanity. I recollect receiving long ago, some twenty-six years ago, a letter from him in which he used this expression: Being invited to come and partake on one occasion the hospitalities of a literary society, he said: "I know the portals of your heart will fly open at a friend's approach like the gates of Peter's prison at the angel's touch."

This sentiment in Garfield's heart touched all his students at Hiram, and among the hundreds who have gone out from that institution not one will forget it; and by the hundreds of splendid women, then young maidens and then in the first blush of glorious womanhood, who received his instructions and who are to-day wearing the golden crown of maternity—by them will be handed down to their children, and by them to generations yet unborn, reminiscences of the kindliness, the greatness, and the magnanimity of this man who was so great among the children of Ohio thirty years ago!

Never will we who used to hear him forget that element in his character that so closely akinned him with the spiritual and led him to admire the brilliant and beautiful touches in "In Memoriam" when he used to quote the lines so often heard and so frequently repeated by him.

> And home to Mary's house return'd,
> Was this demanded—if he yearn'd
> To hear her weeping by his grave?
> "Where wert thou, brother, those four days?"
> There lives no record of reply,
> Which telling what it is to die
> Had surely added praise to praise.
> From every house the neighbors met,
> The streets were filled with joyful sound;
> A solemn gladness even crown'd
> The purple brows of Olivet.
> Behold! a man raised up by Christ!
> The rest remaineth unreveal'd;
> He told it not; or something seal'd
> The lips of that Evangelist.

But, Mr. Speaker, the hour draws on. This statue of purest Parian marble will crumble into dust, but the memory of the marytr President will live; and I could not repeat if I desired a more fitting eulogium than he used to quote with admiration from Tacitus, a classic which once it was his fortune to teach to us at Hiram, and, Mr. Speaker, a more fitting and better and more characteristic statement than that which was made by Tacitus, speaking of the merit of Agricola, a passage I know President Garfield used to admire, does not exist. Said Tacitus in the old language of Rome:

Quidquid ex eo amavimus, quidqu id mirati sumus, manet, mansurumque est in eternitate temporum, fama rerum.

Whatsoever of him we have loved, whatsoever of him we have admired, remains, and will remain in the eternity of time and in the fame of great events. [Applause.]

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I now repeat my motion that the House concur in the Senate resolutions.

The resolutions were concurred in.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. BRAGG. Before the question is taken on the motion to adjourn I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill No. 7, reported for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, be, and is hereby, made the special order for Saturday, the 23d, immediately after the reading of the Journal; and if the debate be not concluded on that day, that there be a night session on Monday, the 25th, at 7.30 p. m., when the debate shall be concluded and the previous question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent, as the Chair understands under the instructions of the Committee on Military Affairs, for the present consideration of the resolution which has been read.

Several members objected.

Mr. BRAGG. I will say to the gentlemen on the other side of the House that this was the arrangement made between the majority and the minority of the committee this morning.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the question is on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

By Mr. COMSTOCK: Of E. Paneborn and 62 others, of Sand Lake, Mich.

By Mr. SESSIONS: Of citizens of Chautauqua County, New York.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

JOHN P. JONES, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of the act of January 26, 1885, a report of the Quartermaster-General upon the claim of Elizabeth Carson; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following concurrent resolution, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound 25,000 extra copies of the President's last annual message and accompanying documents for the use of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Admiral Porter and other officers of the United States Navy, praying for legislation in favor of the mates in the naval service; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of John D. Driscoll, colonel of the Ninth Massachusetts Regiment of Volunteers, and 234 other officers of the various volunteer regiments in Massachusetts, praying for the passage of a bill for the relief of General Fitz-John Porter. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of Mrs. Mary Anna Egan, who asks for a remission of the accumulated interest upon taxes for special improvements on certain property in the city of Washington. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Sarah Jones, of Hood's Run, Ky., widow of Franklin Jones, late a private in Company E, Twenty-second Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, praying that the charge of desertion be removed from the record of her late husband; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Breeding's, Ky., praying for the repeal of the limitation in the arrears-of-pension act; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Esther A. Keyser, of the District of Columbia, praying the passage of an act refunding to her certain sums paid by her for taxes on property in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of a committee representing the convention which met at Savannah, Ga., in November, 1885, praying for the passage of a bill for the speedy prosecution of the works commenced in the harbors on the South Atlantic coast; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 570) for the relief of Jabez Burchard, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 367) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 738) for the relief of James Clifford, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1052) for the relief of Capt. C. H. Warren, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 510) for the relief of Sophia B. Moore, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 605) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased; and

A bill (S. 601) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company (limited), of the city of New York.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 177) for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 1161) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Jacob A. Hale; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 1162) for the erection of a post-office building at Lynn, Mass.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1163) for a public building at Lancaster, Pa.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1164) for the relief of Charles M. Blake, post chaplain of the United States Army, retired; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 1165) in relation to the Supreme and circuit courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I introduce the bill by request. I have not had an opportunity to examine the details of the bill, and therefore am not committed to its provisions. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I also introduce another bill, concerning which I make the same statement.

The bill (S. 1166) in relation to the Court of Claims was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a bill (S. 1167) for the relief of Thomas J. Patrick, of Danville, Va., refunding taxes improperly collected from him on manufactured tobacco; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN. I introduce a bill by request. I have not examined it, and therefore can say nothing as to its merits.

The bill (S. 1168) to extend the provisions of "An act for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands" was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1169) granting a pension to John S. Bridges; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1170) granting a pension to Nancy C. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1171) for the relief of the heirs of John Byrns; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1172) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1173) granting a pension to David E. Ford; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1174) to provide for the coinage of half-dollars, quarter-dollars, and dimes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 1175) to facilitate the giving of bonds required by law; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Edward H. Leib be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PEORIA POST-OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. HALE. I offer a resolution for immediate action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine offers a resolution, which will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to forward to the Senate all papers in relation to the contracts let to Brainard & Co., or to other parties, for the work, or any part of the same, of putting an additional story on the Peoria, Ill., post-office in 1885; also, all protests filed by labor leagues in relation thereto; also, a copy of the protest filed by Messrs. Straub & Co., of Buffalo, N. Y., giving information that the work on said contract would be performed by convict labor, and consequently contractors who employed free labor could not afford to bid for the work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I am not prepared to believe without further information that the Secretary of the Treasury has let any contract for performing work upon public buildings that would be performed by convict labor, but I have had information placed in my possession containing statements so clear and direct that such is the fact that I have felt it important enough to ask for information from the Secretary of the Treasury upon this matter. I have drawn the resolution in such a way that all the information which can be obtained upon this subject-matter may be sent to the Senate, so that if there is nothing in the statements which have been made to me the Secretary may be completely exonerated. I do not believe that any Government contract for work to be done for it should be let to be performed by convict labor when there is no lack of ordinary labor in this country to perform anything and everything that can be done, and that labor should not be put in competition with the labor furnished by the penal institutions of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SIOUX RESERVATION, IN DAKOTA.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to propose an amendment in the form of two additional sections to the bill (S. 52) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder. The amendments relate to the case of the settlers who under the executive proclamation of the 27th of February last went upon the Crow Creek and Winnebago reservations on the east side of the Missouri River and made claims, either homestead, pre-emption, or town site or other claims, under the laws of the United States, and who were subsequently removed from the reservations by an executive order dated, I think, the 17th of April following.

The bill deals with the subject of opening those reservations. If its provisions are accepted by the Indians, a portion of the lands in the Winnebago and Crow Creek reservations will be thrown open to settlement. I think it fair that those persons who under the invitation of the President's proclamation went upon those lands and were afterward required to vacate their claims should have a first claim to take them up again in case they are opened to settlement under the bill; and as to those to whom this privilege can not be extended by reason of the fact that the lands are still retained within the reservations, I think it clear that they ought to be compensated for the losses they have suffered, for they went upon the lands under the invitation of an executive order. In order that this matter may be before the Senate, as I suppose the bill will hardly be up for consideration to-day, I offer the amendments and move that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all correspondence between the United States Government and the Chinese minister and our legation at Peking since the promulgation of our treaty with China governing the emigration of Chinese to the United States having reference to the enforcement of the treaty provisions by the Chinese.

LAND GRANTS IN OREGON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Chair lays before the Senate, under the rule, a resolution coming over from yesterday. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon in senate joint memorial No. 6, recently adopted by that body and now before the Senate, that the companies succeeding to the land grants made by act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from Eugene City, in the State of Oregon, to the eastern boundary of the State, and by act of Congress approved July 5, 1866, granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from Dallas city, Oreg., by way of Camp Watson, Canyon City, and Mormon or Humboldt Basin, to a point on Snake River opposite Fort Boisé, have in no manner complied with the conditions of said grants, but, on the contrary, have failed, neglected, and refused to build or repair any roads along the routes over which they should have constructed them in accordance with the intent and meaning of the acts of Congress aforesaid and of the acts of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon in reference thereto; and

Whereas it is further alleged in such legislative memorial now presented to Congress that by means of false and fraudulent representation and evidence of such compliance said corporations have already obtained and are obtaining patents and lists for large portions of said land, and by means of similar false and fraudulent evidence are about to obtain patents and lists for other large amounts of said lands, and under a claim of privilege and right of selection of lieu lands within 6 miles' limit on either side of the routes of said pretended roads are withholding other large amounts of land in fraud of the Government and to the great detriment and injury of the State of Oregon and its inhabitants: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the truth of each and all of said allegations, and if found to be true, to report to the Senate, by bill or otherwise, what, if any, action can or should rightfully or properly be taken by Congress in the premises.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution. By inadvertence one clause was left out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the words "to the eastern boundary of the State," in the sixth line of the first paragraph of the preamble, insert:

And by an act of Congress approved July 5, 1866, in aid of the construction of a military wagon-road from Albany, Oreg., by the way of Canyon City, to the eastern boundary of the State, and by subsequent legislation changed to go by way of Camp Handly instead of Canyon City.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to modify his resolution. That modification will be made.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Also, in line 7 of the first paragraph of the preamble, I move to strike out the word and figures "July 5, 1866," and to insert in lieu thereof the word and figures "February 27, 1867."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will also be made. The Senator has a right to modify the resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. Has the resolution been introduced this morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was introduced yesterday and laid over and printed. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not see it in print. It is not on my desk, certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the resolution be read as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution without the preamble will be read for the information of the Senate. The preamble is lengthy.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the resolution be read as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modifications occur in the preamble and relate only to dates and forms. The resolution as it now stands will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the truth of each and all of said allegations, and, if found to be true, to report to the Senate, by bill or otherwise, what, if any, action can or should rightfully or properly be taken by Congress in the premises.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that the resolution lie over until it has been printed. It has not been printed yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been printed.

Mr. PLUMB. It has not been laid on the desks of Senators. At all events I can not find one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to postpone the resolution until to-morrow?

Mr. PLUMB. I will move to postpone it until to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I desire to state to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands that the resolution was printed as offered yesterday. I find it on my desk. I will send the Senator a copy of it.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest, as it will not make any delay in regard to the investigation which is proposed, that it is proper to let the resolution lie over until we can see exactly the terms of it.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I consent that the resolution shall go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By consent the resolution will go over until to-morrow and be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the resolution be printed as amended by the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done as a matter of course under the rule.

SENATE SEAL.

Mr. INGALLS. I offered a resolution yesterday from the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that it may be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution reported yesterday by Mr. INGALLS from the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary shall have the custody of the Great Seal, and shall use the same for the authentication of process, transcripts, copies, and certificates whenever directed by the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I move in the first line to strike out the word "Great" before "Seal," so as to read:

That the Secretary shall have the custody of the seal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now I move to add to the resolution the following words:

And may use the same to authenticate copies of such papers and documents in his office as he may lawfully give copies of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment will be considered as agreed to. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ALICE C. UNDERWOOD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar now comes up under Rule VIII. The first case on the Calendar will be stated. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the fact that the first resolution now upon the Calendar comes over from the special session of March last. It will be read.

Mr. INGALLS. How does it come over from the special session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was omitted from being entered upon the Calendar, as it should have been, under the rule, in the session of March last. It will be read and the Senate can then dispose of it as it sees proper. The clerks state that it occurred in that way, and under the rule they hold that it takes its place first on the Calendar. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted March 10, 1885, by Mr. HOAR, and reported March, 19, 1885, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Alice C. Underwood, executrix of the last will and testament of Maria G. Underwood, administratrix of John C. Underwood, deceased, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for the time and expenses of the said John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia.

Mr. ALLISON. Will one objection carry the resolution over now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will. It is subject to objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the resolution goes over under the rules.

Mr. HOAR. Before the resolution goes over I should like to say that the matter has been before the Senate at several sessions; it has been debated two or three times; it never has been voted upon, and it seems to me that not only justice to the persons interested but a due regard for our comfort requires that the Senate should take it up, consider it, understand it, and decide it one way or the other. The debates which have taken place heretofore have shown on the part of very careful and conscientious Senators who have opposed it——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to remind the Senator from Massachusetts that any debate upon the resolution is out of order.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; I ask unanimous consent simply to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I think that when they come to understand the facts thoroughly most of the Senators who originally had that feeling will find that the objection is not as strong as they supposed. I wish to give notice, therefore, that I shall ask at a very early day to take the resolution up and have it disposed of.

Mr. COCKRELL. One moment to correct a misstatement of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senate did once take action upon the resolution, and indefinitely postponed it.

Mr. HOAR. I am not aware of that. I believe not.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know of what I am speaking. The record shows that to be the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is out of order.

Mr. COCKRELL. The resolution was indefinitely postponed on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator is mistaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case on the Calendar will be reported by title.

MAILING OF LOTTERY ADVERTISEMENTS.

The bill (S. 260) to prohibit the mailing of newspapers and other publications containing lottery advertisements, and prescribing a penalty for the violation of the same, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. I am satisfied that a bill of that importance can not be considered in a satisfactory manner under the five-minute rule, and I shall therefore object to its consideration at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Senator from Tennessee to withdraw the objection until I can have one or two amendments to the bill disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly, for that purpose I will, most cheerfully.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There is an amendment to it from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection being withdrawn, the bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, in section 2, line 2, after the word "shall," to insert "knowingly;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That all other persons not embraced in the foregoing section who shall knowingly violate the provisions of this act, with intent to give circulation to any advertisement or notice of a lottery, or any agency thereof, or any notice, report, or statement of any drawing of a lottery, shall be subject to the penalty prescribed in the first section of this act.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood the Senator from Iowa to ask that the objection be withdrawn in order that he might offer some amendments.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desired that amendment acted on, and one other that I intend to propose. That amendment is a limitation of the force of the section, and I thought no Senator would object to its going into the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How does this matter come before the Senate at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under Rule VIII it is at the head of the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to remind the Chair that in dealing with the Calendar under Rule VIII yesterday Order of Business No. 47 was reached. The bill was read, and I had the floor and had begun a statement, when it was suggested that, as it wanted one minute of 2 o'clock, it should be unanimously agreed that the hour of 2 o'clock had arrived. I do not suppose that you can go back to a prior order under these circumstances, but I wish to waive any claim I have to have that matter go, as the Senate has begun this bill. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Iowa, but I claim the right to proceed with that bill when this is over.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Unanimous consent was given that this should be passed, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I know, but that has not given it precedence over a matter actually under consideration.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then it would not retain its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is important that the Senate should decide this matter now, because the contest may occur every morning. The Chair and the officers at the desk take the view that when the consideration of a bill is waived when reached, without prejudice to its place it is to be called in its order the next morning, without respect to a bill that may have been pending at the moment of the arrival of 2 o'clock. That has been the uniform custom and that is the course now being pursued.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that that applies. Such bills retain their place as against all other matters which are not half through and actually under consideration. I do not understand that they are displaced. Suppose, instead of its coming up to-day, that matter had been passed over temporarily to take up another case until some Senator came in. When he arrived, that would not take a Senator off the floor who had the floor on another bill. However, I do not desire to insist on precedence, but when the question arises properly I shall.

Mr. HARRIS. The rule, as announced by the Chair, has been the invariable practice in the Senate since I have observed it, that where a bill has been informally passed over and another bill taken up, even though you were half through its consideration, the Calendar is taken up in regular order next morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been the rule which has been acted on.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As I think there will be no objection to the amendment reported from the committee and to the one I shall propose to section 1, I desire to have them acted on now, in order that we may take up the bill as amended under Rule IX, as the Senator from Tennessee proposed.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the Senator offering any amendment that he would like to have offered and printed; but I prefer not to act on amendments or the bill at this time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well. Of course if the Senator interposes an objection the bill will lie over.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator will offer any amendment he desires.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The amendment I desire to offer to section 1 is, after the words "one hundred," in line 18, to insert "nor more than one thousand;" so as to read:

Any person engaged in publishing a newspaper, as owner or part owner, proprietor, general manager, or superintending agent, president, or other officer connected therewith, and any person engaged in conducting a lottery, as owner or part owner, and any person connected therewith as superintendent, manager, agent, or in any other capacity, violating the provisions of this act, upon conviction thereof, shall be liable to a fine for each offense of not less than two hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, with costs of prosecution, or imprisonment for not less than thirty days nor more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending that amendment, the Senator from Tennessee objects to the further consideration of the bill, and it goes over under the rule. The next bill will be stated.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. HARRISON. The next three orders on the Calendar have been passed over before and may be again. I have given notice that I will call up the Dakota bill on Friday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next three orders on the Calendar will be regarded as objected to. Is it the desire of the Senator that they should retain their place on this Calendar or go to the regular Calendar?

Mr. HARRISON. It is not important that they should remain on this Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be considered as objected to, and go over to the Calendar under Rule IX.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish at this time, in connection with the Dakota bill which has been called to the attention of the Senate, to make an announcement. The Senator from Indiana has given notice that he will call up that bill for action next Friday. I wish to give notice to the Senate that immediately upon the disposition of the Dakota bill I propose to call up Order of Business 15, being the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools. I shall ask the Senate to consider that bill immediately on the disposition of the Dakota bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

SIOUX RESERVATION IN DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 52) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, was announced as next in order.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] has this morning presented and asked to have printed two important amendments to this bill. If the Senator desires to have the bill go over until to-morrow on that account I shall not object.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it would be well that those amendments should be in print before the Senate. Indeed, I desire to look over them myself.

Mr. DAWES. I ask, then, that the bill remain in its place, to be called to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over until to-morrow without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

CHURCH AND STATE.

The resolution submitted on the 11th instant by Mr. MORGAN in relation to the appointment of officers of the United States to participate with the officers of any church in the joint conduct and administration of the spiritual or temporal affairs of such church, &c., was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator offering this resolution not being present, it will by common consent go over.

JOSEPH W. PARISH.

The bill (S. 241) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration. It provides for the payment to Joseph W. Parish, late of Peoria, Ill., of $58,341.85, being the balance of money laid out and expended by him in the purchase of 17,232 tons of ice for the use and at the request of the Government of the United States, which were not afterward called for or taken by the Government, but were wholly lost to Parish.

Mr. HOAR. I think I can make a brief statement which will be understood by the Senate, and then if any Senator desires the reading of the report it can be read.

Joseph W. Parish made a contract with the United States to deliver at four principal cities in the theater of war an amount of ice which should be required to furnish the hospitals and supply other army uses in those cities. He was ordered by the assistant surgeon-general to deliver a certain named quantity (the quantity and the place being left at the discretion of the Government in the contract) at each of the four cities, Cairo, Nashville, Memphis, and Saint Louis; and he purchased the ice and had it on its way. Then he was informed by the Surgeon-General that the action of the assistant surgeon-general was disavowed and that the ice would not be needed. Thereupon all the money which he had spent and all the ice which he had procured was wasted.

He brought his suit in the Court of Claims for the amount which he had spent to prepare himself to comply with the contract, and the Court of Claims held that the act of the assistant surgeon-general was invalid and illegal, on the ground that he had no authority to exercise this power, which belonged to the Surgeon-General alone. Thereupon he went to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court held that the act of the subordinate was lawful, and that it was impossible to carry on the Government without holding that the powers of these heads of bureaus (if that term may be applied to this office in the War Department) could be exercised by the assistant, and accordingly that the petitioner was entitled to recover. He went back to the Court of Claims, and the Court of Claims held that although he was entitled to recover, yet that his case had been made out as a claim for damages technically and not a claim as having set forth the contract and alleging that he had fulfilled it, and that the evidence which he had put in was not sufficient to sustain the claim. Thereupon, instead of going a second time to the Supreme Court and getting an order on the Court of Claims to open the case and admit further evidence, he came to Congress.

The Surgeon-General of the Army recommends the payment of the claim; and the amount which the committee award him is the amount estimated by the War Department and communicated to us in great detail by the Surgeon-General, whose letter is found in the report.

The only objection to the claimant's case is that instead of coming to Congress for his relief, his equitable claim against the Government having been absolutely established, he did not go a second time to the Supreme Court. Well, the result of that technical error on his part has been solely an advantage to the Government, because it has saved the Government interest on this sum of money for all these years, and the committee were of opinion that, the case being a clearly just one, the whole justice of it being established by the Supreme Court and being also conceded by the War Department and the Surgeon General's Office to be just both in its foundation and in its amount, the claimant ought to have the relief which he prays for.

Mr. LOGAN. How much is the claim?

Mr. HOAR. Fifty-eight thousand dollars.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES TRABUE AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 311) for the relief of James Trabue, Thornton Thatcher, Michael Callahan, and the widow of John Waters, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment, in full settlement of the claims of the parties named for use and occupation of property by the United States, to James Trabue, $600; to Thornton Thatcher, $93.33; to Michael Callahan, $113.66; and to the widow of John Waters, $1,825.

Mr. HOAR. These are four little claims embraced in one bill, which have been separately reported from the committee before, for rent. It has been the uniform policy of Congress to pay rent to persons whose property was taken during the rebellion, whose loyalty was established, under circumstances indicating that it was the purpose of the military authorities not to seize the property as enemy's property and occupy it, but to take it and use it on condition of payment. In all these cases there were vouchers given by the quartermasters. They are little sums varying from $90 in one case and $113 in another up to $600 and $1,800; and in all such cases the policy of Congress has been to grant relief.

Mr. INGALLS. If regular vouchers were given, why were the claims not paid by the quartermaster? If the property had been contraband of war, or the parties had been disloyal, vouchers would not have been given in due form.

Mr. HOAR. Vouchers were given in due form in all these cases, as will be seen by the report; but the act of Congress of February 21, 1867, prohibited the officers of the Treasury Department settling and paying such claims where they originated in States lately in rebellion.

Mr. INGALLS. But these claims originated in 1865; why were they not paid before 1867?

Mr. HOAR. I do not know why they were not paid before 1867. Perhaps they were delayed by the ordinary delay; there were a great many such claims. The Senator knows very well in regard to matters of property taken and consumed by the Army they are paid under a general bill which we pass every year; but claims for rent have come to Congress always by special bill and have been allowed. I suppose the Army officials returned with their reports the claims to the Government at Washington in due time and they were settled, but the claimants did not get pay; and during the war in many cases there were great delays attending the operations of the Government.

Mr. INGALLS. Here is a statement in one of these claims; let me call the Senator's attention to it—the claim of Mr. Callahan. The report says:

These claims were reported by the depot-quartermaster at Huntsville, Ala., as being due, and were so borne upon their accounts—

That was in 1865—

They were referred by the Third Auditor of the Treasury to the Quartermaster-General, by whom they were examined and found to be correct. In certifying the claims back to the accounting officers of the Treasury the Quartermaster-General says: "Payment is not conditional on proof of loyalty. The services have been reported to this office as required by the regulations."

In this case the loyalty of the claimant is vouched for on the face of each certificate given him during the period of hostilities, and it is not to be presumed that the officers of the Army would improperly or heedlessly give such a certificate to a disloyal person.

I assume, of course, that a Senator as careful as the Senator from Massachusetts has given due attention to this matter, but here was a claim for rent incurred in 1865 in a disloyal State, and that was certified by all the officers of the Government as not coming within the provisions of law that forbade payment. Now the Senator in 1885, twenty years after the war has closed, reports to us that they were barred from payment by the act of 1867, when they might have been paid two years before. I confess that while I do not propose to resist the passage of the bill, because the amount is not worth the time it would take, it appears to me that this is one of that class of claims, which have been too frequent in late years, of claims arising from disloyal States during the war that are being paid by act of Congress in violation of what seems to me at least true principle in the matter.

Mr. HOAR. The principle, whether it be the true principle or not, is I suppose as well settled as anything in the Congressional legislative policies of this country; and that is, that when the Army took possession in its march by conquest or occupied for military purposes any portion of the territory of the rebel States, it was within the laws and customs of war, if the military authorities saw fit, to take possession by capture of real or personal estate and to appropriate it for the purposes of the United States as booty in the case of personal estate, or for the occupation of the Army in the case of real estate, without any compensation whatever; but if on the other hand the Government did not choose to avail itself of that extreme and harsh rule of war, but chose to hold out by general representation by the commanding officer, by the proclamation of the President of the United States, or by the action of the particular officer in command in any locality as a condition of returning loyalty and good behavior or as a matter of sound policy that that customary right should not be exercised, that parties whose property was taken for the use of the Government should be paid for it, the Government would respect that obligation; and that has been the uniform policy of Congress. When it is shown by the quartermaster's voucher that at the time real estate was taken in territory which, though rebel, had submitted, it was understood that it should be paid for, there the Government will make the payment of a reasonable and proper rental. In those cases the officers had no authority to pay themselves, and during the war they returned to the War Department and from thence to the Treasury their reports of the particular transactions; and as in all cases, especially during the war, those things did not get reached and acted upon very soon, as they were settled they were examined by officers who had a thousand other things to do; few of them were paid, and many of them did not get paid; and then came the act of 1867 peremptorily forbidding any such payment by the authority of a Department, and since 1867 all these cases have come to Congress. We have them by the thousands. In regard to taking personal property for quartermaster's supplies, we have an omnibus bill every session; they are nearly all disposed of; but we have still a few payments to make for rent. While I have been on the Committee on Claims, now for eight years, there has not been an instance of the refusal to pay such a bill by Congress; there has not been an instance, so far as I now remember, of a question being made about it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. GETTY.

The bill (S. 225) to authorize Col. George W. Getty, United States Army, retired, to be placed upon the retired-list of the Army with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri objects, and the bill will be passed over under the rule.

Mr. SEWELL. Did I understand there was objection to the present consideration of the Getty bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] objected.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can hardly discuss it in the morning hour.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator would allow it to go over informally, I should not object; but I object to its going to the other Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be informally passed over without prejudice.

GEORGE T. DUDLEY.

The bill (S. 498) for the relief of George T. Dudley was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that on or about the 18th of May, 1865, George T. Dudley, first lieutenant of Company M, Fiftieth Regiment New York Volunteer Engineers, for visiting the city of Richmond, Va., on the occasion of its evacuation by the confederate army, on the 3d of April, 1865, was dismissed from the United States service by sentence of court-martial, with loss of pay and allowances, having been absent from his command without permission for twenty-four hours; that the facts in the case being put before him, the honorable Secretary of War did order "that the sentence of said court-martial be revoked," intending to restore to the officer his pay and allowances, as well as his rank and commission; and that the order issued by the War Department did not carry out the wishes of the honorable Secretary, but merely restored to the officer his rank and commission, without giving him his pay and allowances, which can only be restored to him by an act of Congress.

Therefore, the bill provides that George T. Dudley shall be entitled to and receive the pay and allowances of his rank which was due him at the date of his dismissal from the service.

Mr. SEWELL. The report in this case will take a little time to read, and I can probably explain the case briefly so as not to take up the time of the Senate.

Lieutenant Dudley was near Richmond at the time of the evacuation and went into the city with the provost-marshal and not with his command, being directed to retire immediately, but was kept on duty there with the provost-marshal and detained until after the evacuation. He was tried and dismissed, however, for absence without leave at a critical period. The Secretary of War, on investigating the matter, restored him to duty and allowed him permission to get a new certificate from the governor of New York, which he did and joined his command; but the restoration to duty did not carry with it, as the Treasury Department decided, the pay then due him. This bill simply allows him the pay that had accrued to him up to the time that he was dismissed, amounting to a couple of months—two or three hundred dollars.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

REPRESENTATIVES OF JOHN M. ROBESON, DECEASED.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 209) for the relief of the legal representatives of John M. Robeson, deceased. It provides for the payment of $1,000 in full satisfaction of all claims of John M. Robeson's estate against the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. PLUMB. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE January 13, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 209) for the relief of the legal representatives of John M. Robeson, deceased, having considered the same, present herewith the following report:

This case has been before Congress several years, and has been considered and favorably reported upon by the Senate Committee on Claims.

This committee adopts the report made at the Forty-eighth Congress, prepared by Mr. PIKE, on this case, which is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 121, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Frances A. Robeson, administratrix of John M. Robeson, late of Independence, State of Missouri, deceased, together with Senate bill No. 372, having had the same under consideration, ask to submit the following report:

The petitioner avers in her petition that she is the widow and administratrix of John M. Robeson, deceased; that, for some time previous to the war of the rebellion, and at the commencement thereof, said John M. Robeson resided in the city of Independence, in the State of Missouri; that he was the owner of a foundry situated in that city; that said foundry was at the beginning of the late war completely furnished with all the machinery, fixtures, and appurtenances necessary for its operation, and was operated by said Robeson until he was compelled to close it or cast cannon-shot for the rebels; that he refused to submit to this latter alternative, and, being loyal to the Government of the United States, he closed his foundry and became a soldier in the Fifth Regiment of Missouri State Militia, commanded by Col. William R. Pennick, which regiment was mustered into the service of the United States; that while he was serving as a soldier in this regiment said Col. William R. Pennick took possession of his said foundry, and used it as a cavalry-yard for the horses of his regiment, and used the tools and iron for shoeing the said horses; that all the machinery, fixtures, patterns, &c., in said foundry were removed or destroyed by the soldiers under command of said officer, and were wholly lost to their owner; that he, John M. Robeson, used every possible effort to prevent this destruction of his property, but without avail; and that the property thus destroyed or carried away was worth from $17,000 to $20,000.

These are substantially the statements contained in the petition. Numerous affidavits are on file. It appears from them that the said John M. Robeson was the owner of a foundry located in Independence, in the State of Missouri; that he was operating the same at the commencement of the war; that he and his widow, the petitioner and his administratrix, were loyal to the Government of the United States; that he refused when requested to aid the rebellion, became a soldier, enlisted in the Fifth Regiment of the Missouri State Militia, commanded by Col. William R. Pennick; that the said Colonel Pennick, as commander of said regiment, and serving under the United States Government, late in the fall of 1862, or the first of the winter of 1862–'63, took possession of said foundry, and used it as a cavalry-yard for the horses of his regiment from that time until 1863; that the blacksmith tools found therein and some wrought iron, belonging to the said Robeson, were used for shoeing the horses of said command; and that a lot of seasoned lumber in said foundry, the property of the said Robeson, was also used by the said regiment in making bunks for the soldiers and in repairing wagons for the command.

It appears from several affidavits in the case that there were in the building at the time it was seized by Colonel Pennick the following items of personal property, with the following estimates of value of each article:

1 engine and boiler	$2,500
1 large iron lathe	1,200
1 medium iron lathe	920
2 small iron lathes, $500 and $350	850
1 iron planer	700
1 screw-cutter	150
1 power-drill	175
1 full set machinists' tools	350
1 full set foundry patterns	4,250
1 lot foundry flasks	950
3 new engines	3,050
5 tons wrought iron, new	500
1 lot machinery belts	350
Machinery for wood shop	750
Lot of unfinished work	650
Lot of seasoned lumber	450
3 full sets smiths' tools	425
Making a total of	18,220

Of the articles enumerated in the above list, alleged to have been used or destroyed by Colonel Pennick's military command, there are but a few which could have been legitimately and properly used for the benefit of the soldiers or to supply the necessary wants of the regiment. The five tons of wrought iron were used in shoeing the horses of the command. The item "sets of smiths' tools" were used for the same purpose. The lot of seasoned lumber was used for making bunks for the soldiers and in repairing the wagons of the regiment. The other articles mentioned in the above bill were not in any sense necessary to nor could they have been used by the regiment, and, if destroyed by the troops, the destruction must have been wanton; and it is well settled by numerous precedents that the Government is not liable to pay for property wantonly destroyed.

Except as to the wrought iron, the proof is indefinite and unsatisfactory. The testimony is silent as to the quantity, kind, or quality of the "lot of seasoned lumber."

The committee recommend the allowance of the following sums:

For 5 tons of wrought iron	$500 00
For lot seasoned lumber	200 00
For three sets smiths' tools	300 00
Making	1,000 00

By the law of the United States, and the construction put upon it by the court, the committee understand that they can not allow anything for the rent of real estate in the absence of a contract therefor; there was no contract in this case. (Act of July 4, 1864, 13 Stats. at Large, 581; Filor v. United States, 9 Wallace, 45.)

The committee recommend that the bill be amended so as to provide for the payment of $1,000 in full satisfaction of all claims, and when so amended that it pass.

No evidence has been furnished the committee that the claimant is administratrix, and the payment of the claim should be made to the legal representatives of the said John M. Robeson, as provided by amendment.

Your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee recommend amendments, as I understood the reading.

Mr. PIKE. There was an amendment reported at the last Congress, which is incorporated in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported at this session without amendment.

Mr. PIKE. That is right.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate presenting the thanks of Congress to the governor, and through him to the people, of Ohio for the statue of James A. Garfield.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 91) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REPORTS ON ALASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report on Alaska by L. M. Turner be printed, with the necessary illustrations, and that 4,000 additional copies be printed; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for distribution under the direction of the Chief Signal Officer of the United States Army.

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report on Alaska by E. W. Nelson be printed, with the necessary illustrations, and that 4,000 additional copies be printed; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for distribution under the direction of the Chief Signal Officer of the United States Army.

COIN DUTIES ON IMPORTED GOODS.

Mr. MORRILL. Pursuant to the notice I gave yesterday, I should like to have the floor on the subject of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks consent of the Senate to proceed now to the consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Kentucky relating to the silver question. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted December 18, 1885, by Mr. BECK, relative to the payment of custom dues and the disbursement thereof, &c.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, on the day of our adjournment for the holiday recess my friend the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, with all of his usual ability and industry, made an elaborate speech of a character that seemed to me then, as it does now, to throw the burden of rejoinder upon the friends of the present Administration. I do not mean to encroach upon the privileges, which so many Democratic Senators appear eager to enjoy, of coming to the rescue of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury against the rather cruel attack made upon a cardinal measure of the Administration, as I know the fate of those who venture to interfere with family quarrels; but this measure, by which silver might be maintained on a par with gold, so worthy of all acceptation, I fear will not have, after the hot demonstration of the recognized leader of his party in the Senate against it, that unanimous support to which it may be fairly entitled. I shall hope, therefore, to be pardoned for briefly attempting to relieve the party from some part of its difficulties by showing that the distinguished Senator in his vigorous leadership has not escaped some new errors, while he may presumptively be assumed to have adhered to all of his old ones. The new and smaller field will be quite as much as I propose at the present time to explore, and, along with that, to offer occasional suggestions which may seem pertinent from my own point of view.

In the first place, let me say that there are no parties, so far as I know, in the Senate or out of it, that propose or that have any wish to demonetize silver. To charge otherwise is a baseless assumption and unworthy of the arena of fair debate. Everybody is willing, nay anxious, to keep as much of silver in circulation as can be done, and keep it at the same time at par with our gold coinage. The only hostility to silver arises from what seems to be a fixed and passionate purpose on the part of some of its advocates to promote such an excess of silver coinage as will drive gold coinage out of the country and leave our vast trade and commerce based upon silver only. In reaching this position of silver monometallism it is impossible to be blind to the disastrous contraction of the circulating medium of the country that would at once occur, for when the moment arrives that gold commands a premium it will all be held as a commodity for sale, not for circulation, a small or a 5 per cent. premium being as productive of universal hoarding as 25 per cent.; and no possible advantage to our people could be expected from following the lame and feeble example of India or Mexico in utilizing a silver currency only, but they would be sure to be visited by all the evils arising from the abandonment of that currency with which at least 90 per cent. of all our commercial business with foreign nations has been and must be conducted, by all the evils ever predicated upon the use of a comparatively inferior or depreciated coinage everywhere known to be, as a sole reliance, clumsy and inconvenient in the great bulk of financial transactions, domestic as well as foreign, and a coinage now less than ever promising to be stable and fixed as a standard of value.

No, Mr. President, there is no war upon silver, which, if made, would be equally regretable, only that we have but half as much of it; but, instead, we have in substance and effect, I fear, if not in words, a declaration of war upon gold, in the most insidious and destructive form, by the leader of the Democratic party in the Senate, who proposes to supersede it in the use and place of honor it has hitherto maintained.

As the conclusions of all the Treasury officials we have ever had, after years of special study, are adverse to those of the Senator from Kentucky, and as I am not disposed to believe that their financial reputations have been suddenly overthrown by a "cyclone," nor that their utterances are only to be taken in a technical and "Pickwickian sense" which they are swiftly to abandon, I do not, therefore, feel it to be necessary for me to weary the Senate with all of the statistical lore of their long array of facts, which, though often avoided, few have attempted to refute.

It will not be necessary for me, in consequence of the line of my argument, as it seems to have been for the Senator from Kentucky, to give any assurances that I am not and never was the owner of any stock in silver mines, although I sincerely rejoice in all their legitimate prosperity, however great that may be, and while I am entirely ready largely to protect their silver, it seems imprudent to me to buy and hold it all.

The speech of the Senator from Kentucky opened with such an impressive eulogium upon the glories promised in the message of the President and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that I could not but apprehend it might be true that these officials were doomed to suffer, as the country had for some time been warned before the distinguished Democratic leader got to the end of his speech. In this respect the speech reminded me of a sermon I heard in my boyhood from an excellent Baptist minister, when, after dwelling in detail upon the great promises of the gospel, he said:

I now come to the threatenings of the gospel, and it gives me great pleasure to dwell upon them.

It did seem to me that the Senator delivered his antagonisms to the policy of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury with more pleasure and with greater emphasis than any other part of his speech; and my excuse for the Senator—and he well knows he can hardly do anything I am not ready to excuse—was this, that the Democratic leader was under the delusion for the moment that he was, as has long been his chronic habit, belaboring with left-handed compliments some Republican President and Republican Secretary of the Treasury. As for myself, I looked on with composure, confident, however the contest might terminate, in the "survival of the fittest."

My convictions that the continuance of the coinage of large amounts of silver will have the effect of driving gold out of the country and of leaving all of our business snowed in or floundering in the silver-standard blizzard now raging, are largely based upon the past experience of all civilized people, that the inferior money never fails to expel the superior, and upon the facts that our own silver mines annually furnish one-half or more of the entire annual product of the world, being in 1884 the sum of $48,800,000, which, with our imports, mainly from Mexico, amounting in 1885 to $16,550,627, makes our total annual supply over $65,000,000. This appears far more than we can practically absorb, and all that portion not used for coinage and the arts must here find a market for exportation. The large and frequent sale of this surplus establishes its commercial value, and is the tell-tale barometer which daily exhibits the wide disparity between the nominal value and the intrinsic value of our silver coinage. No large excess of the nominal value of coinage can long withstand the effect of such public disclosures. With this disparity always visible it will prove to be a strain even upon our all-abounding silver-tongued orators to overcome the reluctance of the common people to aid by "faith and works" the circulation of silver dollars.

The exodus of gold, however, is not likely to appear with much force until its shipment becomes frequent, or until it commands a premium; but a large return of American securities from abroad, affecting foreign exchange adversely, or any great commercial disaster, from which the world is never exempt, may suddenly produce this result, and then, like swallows at the first approach of autumnal frosts, gold would take wings and depart, no one knowing whither.

It is true that many gentlemen of great respectability do not think there is any peril in the largest as well as perpetual outpouring of silver from the Mint. They see the Secretary of the Treasury, like some strong swimmer in the rapids of Niagara, pulling with all his might against the current, but they see no signs of any disaster, and seem to believe that no harm need be apprehended even if the fatal plunge should be made. They rely upon the marvels of our history, and hold it incredible that the progress of the nation can ever be arrested, for "have we not been victorious," they ask, "in big wars; why then should we be alarmed about any defeat in a little war with gold-bugs?"

The questions relating to our currency are of great moment and above mere partisan questions, that may be here to-day and gone to-morrow.

In the discussion of these grave questions it is always well to adhere with some precision to facts. The preamble to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky begins as follows:

Whereas the laws of the United States require that all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin.

This unfortunately does not happen to be altogether true. All duties may be paid in coin, in silver or gold certificates, or to a limited extent in United States notes payable on demand, which were authorized to be issued prior to the 25th day of February, 1862; and it is well also to remember that the resumption of specie payments occasioned some changes in the practical administration of the law, by which the custom-house collectors received United States notes, knowing they might call at once upon subtreasurers for their redemption instead of always imposing that messenger duty upon importers. The Government was neither richer nor poorer whether the gold, all the time in its custody, was in one or the other place.

The Senator sets forth the provisions of the Revised Statutes that "the coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund," and shall be applied, "First, to the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States; second, to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States to be made within each fiscal year, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct; third, the residue to be paid into the Treasury."

These provisions of law, the Senator asserts, no man will contend are now or that they have for many years past been obeyed, and yet we have only to read the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury to learn that the receipts of the fiscal year 1885 from customs, and apart from all other receipts, are $181,471,939.34. This would seem to show so far strict obedience to the first requirement of the law, and, when we reach the second, we find by the same report that "United States bonds and fractional currency to the amount of $45,604,035.43 were applied to that fund during the past fiscal year." Is not all this well and properly done? If the remainder of the money from customs is and has been in the Treasury, a fact not disputed, it is a mistake for anybody to assert that the third and last requirement of the law quoted has not been fully obeyed. There is no provision of any law which designates silver instead of gold for any payments whatsoever, and there has been enough money received from customs thus far equivalent to gold to cover all the purposes specified. It will not be contended by any man, unless it be by the Senator from Kentucky, that each piece of money as it comes into the custom-house should have been branded or ear-marked and then set apart in some far-off private compartment, not to be covered into the Treasury until the end of the year, or until the interest on the public debt and the sinking fund had been fully paid in the branded money; and, therefore, all of the provisions of the law would appear to have been honestly and fairly obeyed. Most certainly there is no need of any change in the system of book-keeping at the Treasury Department.

The Senator must permit me to say—no matter what may be his avowed subject of discussion—that he rarely fails to give vent to some vituperative explosions intended to do grievous harm to the tariff; and whether these explosions jar the tariff or not, what I most regret is that they always jar him. So, in his latest effort, he rather recklessly, as it appears to me, ventures to assert that the great American agricultural industries "receive no real consideration here, and are not even ranked among the industries of the country over which Congress is asked or expected to throw its protecting arm." The record will show, I think, that this statement has been made without being based upon even a fraction of evidence in its support. The farmers of the Canadian Dominion, as are all other foreigners, are subjected to regular duties upon cattle, sheep, wool, hay, barley, pease, potatoes, starch, &c., when brought into our markets. There is no article of "domestic products" of any prominence requiring protection which has not been considered and which has not been actually covered by our tariff. Tobacco in the leaf is subjected to a high duty; and corn, wheat, pork, bacon, lard, beef, cheese, butter, sugar, leather, oils of all kinds, hemp, flax, and even peanuts are not omitted. If there is a single agricultural product that has been neglected let it be named, and I shall have great pleasure in following the lead of the Senator from Kentucky in giving it a "protecting arm." Upon one question, at least, we will go arm in arm. Surely the Senator forgot, when he made his statement, where he was, and supposed he was on the stump in the blue-grass region instead of the United States Senate. Certainly agricultural products have not been neglected.

It is true, our New World is so vast in extent, with its free homesteads and free trespassing upon Government lands, that food products have become so abundant and cheap that we are now able to furnish to foreign markets a surplus for which we do not find consumers at home, however reduced the price; and prices here for agricultural product will be still more reduced whenever protection is withdrawn from manufactures—curtailing consumers and increasing producers—which the Senator constantly and loudly proposes. We have interfered in Great Britain enormously with the profits of their farmers and with rentals by our cheaper exports of wheat, beef, and pork; and lately they have much sore competition from our exports of even dairy products. The farmers of England have "no protecting arm," and are full of lamentation, except when they read one of the Senator's free-trade speeches.

That extreme depression in the prices of all products prevails throughout the world no one disputes; but unquestionably there is less suffering here than elsewhere. Modern improvements in machinery and the universal application of steam-power appear to have produced a surplus of manufactures among all the leading nations, and all are more anxious to sell than to buy. The reduced cost of transportation brings the harvests of the remotest lands into all ports and all markets. India, Africa, Australia, and New Zealand are neighbors to all mankind, and their products must now be counted. The great powers of Europe, hungry for the ungathered scraps of trade to be found lurking among the rudest tribes of men, are making war for colonial empire, for the islands of the sea, or for petty provinces, and spending millions upon millions abroad as the price of protection to manufactures at home, which some of them there ostentatiously pretend to refuse. Our policy, on the contrary, is altogether peaceful, and it does not, with hostile armies, invade peaceful communities; but we prize the home market, with its fifty millions of prosperous people, so highly as to be unwilling to surrender it to any kind of foreign invasions, civil or military.

The Senator makes the lugubrious declaration that "Our carrying trade is gone and is in the hands of our foreign competitors." This is partly true, but is only true because our own people and capital can be more profitably employed. American sailors will not accept the scale of wages paid on foreign ships, nor will they consent to live on their limited fare. Very few of the foreign lines in the carrying trade are now making sufficient money for their owners to pay for the ordinary wear and tear, and nearly all would be glad to find purchasers for their ships. At the present time, though very much of our carrying trade is "in the hands of (low-paid) foreigners," it is no serious loss to us and very little advantage to them. But whenever the business shall promise better returns—better than silver-mining or better than building and running railroads—our people will show their former aptitude by reclaiming the business. That the germinal idea is not dead and gone may be seen from the official report on commerce and navigation, which shows that during the four years ending with 1884 there were constructed in this country 4,937 vessels, with a tonnage of 1,053,672 tons. If there were ever made a greater amount of tonnage in any four years when we were near the basis of free trade, as from 1857 to 1861, I have been unable to discover it. But the Senator appears unconscious that he is doing all he can to place our manufacturing trade alongside of our carrying trade "in the hands of foreign competitors."

That trades-people as well as the farmers of Great Britian are suffering more than in the United States may be seen by the speeches of Lord Salisbury, as reported in his late political campaign; it is also piteously proclaimed by the many thousands now crying for bread in Glasgow, the ship-building center of Great Britain, and it sufficiently appears in a late letter of the London correspondent of the New York Times, a free-trade paper, from which I will take an extract:

Any day during the past fortnight one could see thousands of faint and ragged wretches prowling outside the wharves, each ready to fight the other in order to be one of a score who were admitted to a day's work for 40 cents if a ship happened to come in. Everywhere business is reported to be worse than a year ago. When it was stated a year ago that the British ship-building industries were off half a million tons, it seemed that the worst showing had passed; but the report now is likely to show another diminution, and one nearly as great. This is a sample of all industries, while the farmer's prices have reached a starvation point.

This is the condition of affairs in the land of free-trade, and I do not think our own people will be anxious to exchange conditions notwithstanding the pity manifested by the Senator from Kentucky for those who will never know, unless they read the Senator's speech, how badly off they really are.

By the report of the United States Treasurer it appears that there is somewhere in the Treasury $165,535,000 of standard silver dollars, which we are struggling to find how and where to safely store until by some miracle they can find more favor in a wicked world. The percentage of these dollars in actual circulation, outside of the Treasury, it also appears, has been constantly growing less since 1881, being then 30.8 per cent. and now only 18.8 per cent. We have coined over two hundred and fifteen million of silver dollars, and have only been able at any time, through much cost and tribulation, to get not quite fifty million into spasmodic circulation, or a circulation which has no confiding repose, but seems to be disgorged from all pockets with a now-or-never promptitude, much to the dismay of the recipients. People do not like to be compelled by law to carry it. We do not receive it here ourselves with any praiseworthy cordiality. Our condition is somewhat like that of one of our distinguished humorists, who in our late war would not enlist himself, but was very willing that all his wife's relations should. All are willing that everybody else may enjoy the single silver banquet, but as for ourselves individually it has no temptation.

It is true that it is often smartly claimed that over ninety million of the one hundred and sixty-five million now in the Treasury of these standard silver dollars is represented by an issue of that amount of silver certificates, meaning to convey the inference that these certificates will ultimately all be met and paid with silver; but this is practically a circumlocutory fraud, cheating nobody, however, but ourselves, so long as the holders of the certificates have the option of taking the turkey instead of the buzzard, or so long as the holders have the option of tendering them at the custom-house as an equivalent of gold. None ever have been redeemed with silver and none ever will be. When gold has been exchanged for silver certificates, the owners made their "calling and election sure" through the custom-house.

For the month of December, in 1884, 44 per cent. of the receipts at the custom-house in New York were in silver certificates and 41 per cent. in April, 1885.

The Secretary of the Treasury has already found it necessary to resort to unusual resources to avoid the shock to all business interests of a sudden drop from using both gold and silver, hitherto ever maintained by our country, to a single silver standard. Whenever the Government from inability or from indisposition shall fail to maintain the silver dollar on a par with gold, all of the silver certificates as well as all other paper currency, together with the silver dollar itself, will fall to the exact commercial value of the bullion contained in the standard silver dollar. All of our legal tender must then stand on that basis. There is no financial or legislative witchcraft that offers any other fate.

But we have on hand seventy-five million of unused and unusable silver, unrepresented even by the conceit of silver certificates, and, beyond this, more than twenty-five million of unavailable fractional silver. For every dollar of this large amount our people are subjected to an equal amount of taxation, and every year of the present continued coinage of the idle silver dollar this taxation must be perpetuated and also augmented in order to provide for the monthly purchase of silver bullion. With or without the probable deficit in the Treasury next year of $24,000,000, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, ought we to continue the expenditure of twenty-four million for bullion to annually add twenty-eight millions to our present unwieldy pile of silver dollars and to increase our peril of utter divorce from gold?

The Senator from Kentucky asserts that there has been no depreciation in silver, except when tested by the price of bullion in London, because the prices of many products are lower in 1885 than they were in 1870; and he gives us a table of average export prices for beef, wheat, corn, eggs, sugar, &c., as proof of his assertion. No one contends that legal-tender silver has yet become, as legal tender, depreciated; but the contention is that, as silver bullion has depreciated here and everywhere else, the depreciation of silver as legal tender, unsupported by gold, will be sure to follow its enthronement as our sole standard dollar, and that that enthronement is impending, and threatens us upon every monthly additional purchase of siver by the Government. Its approaching dominance is so apparent, that the President felt it his duty to inform us in his message that gold was beginning to be hoarded. It is assumed, however, that the President need not be heeded, because he has been "alarmed." The newspapers say that the "Sage of Geystone," Governor Tilden, has bought large amounts of foreign exchange. Alas! has he, too, been alarmed?

To show, however, the lack of infallibility of the Senator's table purporting to give "the annual average export price in currency" of several articles of domestic product, it may be only necessary to refer to the single article of "eggs," which, it is claimed, were exported at the price of 39.6 cents per dozen in 1870 and at 21.5 cents in 1885. Surely foreign hens in 1870 must have been on a strike; but will anybody believe that eggs, to the extent of dozens were actually exported and found a market abroad in 1870 at the price of over 39 cents per dozen, or that any of the other articles named found a ready sale abroad at the figures set forth?

I do not think for a moment the Senator himself intended any deception by his table, but I fear he has been humbugged by some careless official or greenhorn tabulator. The table gives the prices of 1870 and 1885 in "currency;" but in 1870 our currency was wholly of depreciated paper, and gold bore a high premium. In 1885, however, our currency, I am happy to say, was at par with gold. It appears to me not too much to have expected, from the usual acuteness and fairness of the Senator from Kentucky, that he should not only have discovered this fact, but should not have left it buried out of sight.

Selected statistics can be made to prove almost anything. For example, the table already mentioned gives the prices of some products in the year 1860, an era somewhat approaching to Democratic free trade; but the Senator from Kentucky took good care to avoid exhibiting these prices when cotton and wheat brought very low prices, and when beef, pork, bacon, and butter sold for a good deal less than they do now. There was no such general depression of prices or trade in 1860 throughout the world as exceptionally prevails now, while in 1870 everything was inflated.

The fall in the value of silver in the United States has been denounced by some of our advanced silver financiers as though it was a trick of the Wall-street bondholders, and not like the recent fall in the value of copper, owing entirely to a largely increased supply and a diminished demand. The banks are also denounced as conspirators engaged in this unholy depreciation of one of the precious metals, because their customers, whom they serve, have not found a use for it; but the imputation is hardly less preposterous than it would be to charge the banks with the depreciation in the value of copper, because they do not buy and hoard uncalled-for millions of bronze or copper cents. Democratic Treasury officials are held to be no more honest than their predecessors, and it is not for me to claim that they are, but all have been at work from the early morn until the evening twilight in pushing silver at every cross-roads of the country, although they are esteemed in some quarters as nothing less than traitors because they have not had greater success, as accredited missionaries, in persuading mankind that the silver dollar was worthy of a more obedient faith and greater adoration among the unconverted.

It would be well to remember that no country in all the world has been exempt from the depreciation of silver. Mexico cannot obtain any higher price for her silver bullion than can our miners in the State of Nevada or Colorado. The silver rupee of India, with a nominal value of two shillings, will not buy more of British merchandise than about what one shilling and sixpence would be an equivalent for in the money standard of Great Britain. The indictment for a conspiracy will have to cover the whole world. It is difficult to see how parties in America could conspire to cheapen the price of silver in the markets of Europe or of India, and silver in bars or bricks may be expected everywhere to obey the law of supply and demand with as much regularity as the same bars and bricks obey the law of gravitation, regardless of petulant epithets distributed upon bankers and bondholders.

The Senator is so much of a devotee of the silver dollar, intrinsically worth less than 80 cents, that he proposed at once to commence the payment of the public debt with that coin and no other, although later he seemed to have consented to a mixture. Of course he expects to carry the Empire State in 1888 on his platform. Not himself eligible as a candidate for the Presidency, the distinguished Senator waves his banner reckless of the clouds, without any "silver lining," which there betoken the fate of any Democratic son of New York who may seek to conquer under that sign. What does the original or the revised programme portend? Of course the inevitable result of using silver in the payment of the public debt would be to banish gold, or two-thirds of all our present metallic circulation, and leave us with nothing but silver coinage. Our five or six hundred millions of gold would soon command a premium, increasing day by day. Go where it might, it would have more appreciation, and its departure could not fail to produce a serious monetary crisis, a contraction which Congress would be promptly asked to cure by an indefinite issue of a new edition of legal-tender greenbacks or by a revival of the "wild-cat banks" to supply the place of the departed gold. This, or anything, the Supreme Court has already announced Congress may do at its pleasure. Such a step once taken, however, the experience of the world shows can not be easily retraced. It might possibly cure some financial vagaries of those who think everybody crazy but themselves, and who now have no ears to hear except when addressed by those with whose sentiments they are in accord, but the cure would come too late.

The distinguished Senator made his irrefutable sneer at "bankers and bondholders and their able and well-paid press" as though they were conspirators wickedly trying to keep up the premium on our bonds, but he unquestionably knows that it will make no scrap of difference to bankers and bondholders now whether our bonds bear a premium or not. All they expect to realize or can realize from their bonds is the fixed rate of interest and their par value when due, and it makes not a farthing's difference to the Government whether bonds bear a premium or not, unless the Government proposes to use its funds for speculative purposes and make purchases of them in advance of their maturity. If there are any parties who desire to organize new banks, they might be interested in depressing the cost of bonds in order to obtain all that were required for that purpose without a premium. Surely, it ought not to be a reproach that any parties, directly or indirectly, are striving to uphold the credit of the Government.

When the United States were striving to obtain in 1863 a loan of one thousand million dollars by the issue of its bonds, subscribers to the loan were assured, by its only authorized agent, that the bonds were payable in gold. The letter of Jay Cooke, as agent of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated March 13, 1863, and everywhere published and distributed, contained the following statement:

> First, these bonds are called five-twenties, because, while they are twenty-year bonds, they may be redeemed by the Government in gold at any time after five years.
> The duties on imports of all articles from abroad must be paid in gold, and this is the way Secretary Chase gets his gold.

This statement by the agent of the Secretary of the Treasury, with his knowledge and approval, was never questioned nor controverted, in Congress or out, for years afterward. All branches of the Government then so understood the contract, and knew the creditors so understood it. Silver dollars had never had any prominence as money of the United States. We had circulated little of it and made less, or from 1805 to 1839 only $1,000,000 were coined, and up to 1869 only $4,709,490 of silver dollars were coined. Such were the circumstances of the past and the only basis upon which our people could judge of the future.

The letter of the law unquestionably made United States bonds payable in either gold or silver coin, but this was done when no silver dollar was in circulation, then worth more also than a gold dollar, and when the policy of the Government had been for generations to coin little more of silver than what was required for ordinary use as change. This policy had prevailed up to the act of 1878, which then started on a new theory, and provided for extraordinary and successive issues of silver dollars monthly, or seemingly determined by the revolutions of the moon, intrinsically then worth about ten per cent. less than par; but this legislation it was never proposed by its leading advocates should be adhered to, unless we found ourselves able to make some agreement with other bimetallic nations by which silver could be maintained in universal circulation at par with gold. This expected agreement appears to have been impossible, and certainly appears impossible at present. Our own legislation is hastening a disastrous revolution, as the President and Secretary of the Treasury believe, in all the conditions surrounding the silver dollar, now in danger of further depreciation, and the question arises, can we with proper decency take advantage of our own act to pay off the bonds of the United States at a cost of only 79 cents or less on the dollar?

For many years we have paid both interest and principal of these bonds in gold, and this inflexible rule has given the pledge of public faith that they would forever continue to be so paid until their final extinguishment. It was this trusting faith of our own people which enabled the Government to refund its bonds at the low rate of 3 per cent. interest, and these are the bonds which the Senator from Kentucky so sternly advises the Secretary of the Treasury should be paid at once, and paid in silver. Woe be to the Secretary if he dares to disregard this blast of the silver buglemen!

Saying nothing about what would or would not be conducive to the public honor, it may be truthfully asserted that it concerns the highest interest of our future career in the world's history to preserve the public credit above all criticism and above all suspicion of the smallest financial crookedness.

Whatever loss might be suffered by those who are now our public creditors by a sudden change to payment in silver instead of gold, it would be the merest bagatelle, unworthy of consideration, comparatively, with the loss which would be suffered by the wage-earning portion of the people. Creeping upon them imperceptibly, they would find their means of subsistence, month by month, growing less and less, and not until every one else had looked out for himself would these sons of toil, at all times our largest creditor class, if ever, find any redress.

These sufferers would also find little consolation in the fiat of the Government, by which, without any legislation upon the tariff, a horizontal reduction had been accomplished of 21 per cent. or any other amount, simply by forcing silver to be received at the custom-house, and thereby making a wide opening for foreign workingmen to be employed instead of our own. Possibly it may be the last resort of revenue reformers to effect the changes they seek by changes of the monetary standard. At present the Mexican silver dollar, containing more silver than our standard dollar, is rated by the Treasury Department at eighty-one cents and six mills, but when we drop to the silver standard, the Mexican dollar would be rated two cents and four mills above par.

The Senator also solemnly said this:

I desire to say with great distinctness that I am not making war on bondholders or national banks or bankers.

And yet, like Shylock, he is constantly whetting his knife to take the pound of flesh nearest their hearts. Our bonds are largely held by national banks and by savings-banks. The stock of national banks (holding $308,000,000 of bonds, largely 3 percents) is owned by a very large proportion of small shareholders, as was shown years ago by the Comptroller of the Currency. The number of depositors in the savings-banks of the Middle States was 1,473,319, averaging for each $356.94; the number of depositors in New England was 1,460,185, averaging for each $337.20; and there is hardly a township in all the North where small bonds will not be found distributed. They are often held for the heirs of deceased persons, and, with rare exceptions, they are seldom held by millionaires, for the reason that such persons are able to find more profitable investments. This is the true character of those who now hold our bonds, and yet they are covered with defamatory epithets as though they were culprits worthy of sentence to a dungeon or to a chain-gang.

During the long ascendency of the statesmen of the Democratic party, when the Government was controlled by their most eminent leaders, one of the most notable characteristics of the party was its inflexible hostility to paper money and its rapturous devotion to gold, "glittering through the interstices of every man's silken purse." That was the Bentonian slogan leading to victory during the era of Jacksonian Democracy, and the reason for the law of 1834, approved by Jackson, by which gold was brought into the country and silver almost wholly expelled; and it was also the pith and force of the Van Buren subtreasury act, which aimed to wholly divorce the Treasury from all paper money. In those days it was the pre-eminent policy of the party in relation to making gold coins circulate at home in the hands of the people which apparently gave to its supporters their highest political prestige. Why is it that these fundamental principles of Jefferson, these favorite doctrines of Jackson, should now be esteemed as heterodox and be dismissed with elaborate denunciations by those who claim to be the legitimate political heirs to all of the renown of these great historic names? It can not be that any section of any party is covertly seeking a cheaper dollar, to-day barely worth 79 cents and 2 mills, with which to pay off the wages of laboringmen; and I trust there is neither new-born nor old-lingering reluctance in any quarter as to paying the annual pensions of Union soldiers in dollars worth at all times and everywhere 100 cents. The Senate of the United States, it is to be presumed, would not be the forum where any measure designedly favoring a 79-cent dollar with which to pay State debts would find favor. And may I not also hope that the full cost of a restored Union will not be esteemed so great as to justify the risk of even its possible diminution by indirection, or to tempt the payment of what remains unpaid, in money that may not be current in any other part of the civilized world.

The Senator from Kentucky reminded us of the passage of an act of Congress in 1869 declaring that the bonds of the United States should be paid in coin, "against the vote and protest [as he is happy to say] of every Democrat in both Houses." In all our previous history no public debt, at home or abroad, was ever contracted by the United States with any other expectation than that it would be paid in coin, and the coin only of the country. No civilized nation has ever contracted a public debt on any other basis, or on the idea of reserving the right to pay it in its own depreciated paper, and any nation proposing such a payment would be forever branded with degradation in the estimation of the civilized world. Those who invested their means in our bonds assumed the risk of the war and trusted to the good faith of the people. We were as much morally bound to pay our bonds in coin before as after the passage of the act of 1869, which was the first act approved in the administration of General Grant. But the Senator then was here in opposition, as I understand it, to the Union party, and that opposition was very damaging to the public credit. Up to the time of this act, by which the public credit was strengthened and established, we had been paying 6 per cent. interest or more on all of our public debts; but ever since we have been able to do much better in refunding bonds at much lower rates, saving millions upon millions thereby; and, but for the protracted opposition brought against fixing a time for the resumption of specie payments on United States notes, we might have had still lower rates of interest at an earlier period, in refunding a much larger part of the public debt. And yet the Senator is "happy" to say that the act of 1869 "was passed by Congress against the vote and protest of every Democrat in both Houses." Has not the Senator inadvertently disclosed the index-finger with which, as the recognized leader of his party, he is pointing out the way to eventually pay off the public debt with a cheaper coin? He obviously still thinks that it would have been square and right to have paid the bonds in legal-tenders when they were worth, as he declares, only 60 or 70 cents on the dollar. He does not say when he would have paid the legal-tenders, nor with what. But, all the same, public creditors would have been forced, if "every Democrat in both Houses" could have had his way, to surrender bonds bearing interest for paper promises bearing no interest and depreciated, as the Senator has said, to the extent of 30 to 40 per cent. The Senator is no longer in the opposition, but, it must be admitted, he preserves his consistency.

The Senator referred to France and other members of the Latin Union for an example that we should follow, but forgot to mention that they have all, or nearly all, some years since—France in 1879—ceased to coin silver, and have limited even minor silver coinage. They stopped about the time we began, willingly surrendering the whole business and the whole responsibility. By that means they have been able to maintain their present stock of silver on a par with gold, and that is now the most important part of their example which we might safely follow, but from which the Senator blinds his eyes and turns and runs. By their latest monetary convention, signed on the 12th of December last, these powers appear to have agreed ultimately to call home their silver coin for redemption, Belgium engaging not to make any change in its monetary system that might prevent the silver from returning, or, if she does, then to take back all her silver at once. And further, if the surplus after exchange exceed two hundred million of francs, then to reimburse so much that the sum not reimbursable shall not exceed one hundred millions. Similar provisions have been made by other parties to the treaty.

Like Belgium, we have been making large nominal profits on the coinage of silver, but the day may come, unless we can reach some international arrangement with the bimetallic nations, when the voice of our own people will demand its redemption in coin equal to its full nominal value. Government wealth, fictitiously accumulated by the issue of coins above their intrinsic value, never has been and is not likely now to be a permanent inheritance. It would be better for the present not to have too much of it outstanding for any possible or final day of settlement.

To continue the coinage of the present standard silver dollar of 412½ grains when much more than 480 grains of silver can be purchased for a dollar is exposing the country to very grave risks, not of counterfeits, but of dollars made in exact similitude of our own and containing an equal amount of silver. Twenty-five per cent. of clear profit is a great temptation. There is no kind of manufactures known anywhere promising equal or safer profits to bold and unscrupulous enterprise. What is to prevent the establishment of competing mints in Mexico, in Canada, or anywhere else, from injecting into the country a multitude of alien but undistinguishable dollars, in every way just like our own, and, by all the known tests of experts, just as good as our own? In the hands of innocent holders, how can they be arrested, or who can be punished? The danger signals may not now be heeded, but time may disclose the fact that they should have been heeded.

Some references were also made to the large amount of coin held by France, as though we were deficient or had not reached the proper and supremely advantageous maximum required for national prosperity. The conditions, however, are widely different in France, where there is only one bank, with branches in a few of their most prominent cities, and therefore almost every man there most hold some amount of ready money constantly on hand for daily use. He can not deposit his funds in a bank to obtain interest thereon until he may need to pay it out and then draw his check upon a neighboring bank, as nearly all of our people are in the daily habit of doing. This accounts for the unusual amount of coin required for circulation in France. With our numerous banking institutions our people do not bury their talents and, therefore, get along with a far less amount.

But our gold and silver coin, together with all the authorized paper circulating as money, has had a prodigious expansion within a half dozen years, and may now be said to be overabundant, or far more than is really required. It amounted January 1, 1879 to $1,055,356,619, and on November 1, 1885, the amount was $1,556,914,798, having been increased by over $500,000,000. There is no deficiency in the supply of money, of which an unexampled surplus may be found almost everywhere awaiting some demand for remunerative employment. Capitalists and banks all have money to lend; and large idle deposits in banks, as well as the low current rates of interest, testify to the universal plethora of the money markets; but the real trouble is a lack of general confidence as to the present standard of money. Investments and contracts are no longer made with abiding trust in the future. Silvery, if not slippery, propositions are too frequently made in Congress, and received with a too conspicuous appreciation, for the healthy stability of business.

The large nominal profits in the coinage of silver dollars are subject to very heavy drawbacks. The cost of coining is 1½ cent for each dollar, amounting since 1878 to over $3,000,000, or to about $42,000 for each and every month. The inconvenience and expense for additional vaults has been large, and even the expense attending telegraphic correspondence is not small, amounting at the New Orleans mint sometimes to $200 in a single quarter of the year. But the expense of transportation incurred by the Treasury Department in its industrious efforts to popularize silver in all markets and way places is enough at least to dissipate any surprise that no private enterprise has attempted the task. The express charges from 1878 to 1885 on the shipment of $55,000,000 from Philadelphia were $217,389.83, or $3.94 per thousand, and for $25,000,000 more shipped to subtreasurers the charges were $28,151.29. The charges on shipments from the San Francisco mint of $13,541,500 were $125,033.25, or $9.23 per $1,000—almost 1 per cent. The express charges at New Orleans for the shipment of $25,546,998 have been over $56,000.

Shipments from the mint at Carson, Nev., have been peculiarly expensive. For example, $150,000 were sent to New Orleans at a cost of $2,625; on $450,000 shipped to Saint Louis the charges were $5,625. From $22 to $30 per $1,000 were charged on shipments to places in Montana. On shipments to Leadville, Colo., the express charges were at the rate of $20.60 per $1,000, and to Trinidad and other places in Colorado $11 per $1,000. Shipments have been made to places where a silver famine seemed to exist with only 33 inhabitants, according to the latest census. The shipments have varied in amount from $500 to $6,000,000. Silver thus has been shipped at much cost, wherever an opening has been found, and yet Treasury officials are berated as insincere and destitute of honesty because they have not bewitched the world with more love for silver dollars, although they appear to have kept the axles of the express cars hot in their transportation to every nook and corner of the continent. The expenses attending any of the contingencies of coinage and distribution of the silver dollar, however large they may be, are perhaps insignificant compared with the loss to be borne by the Government from having paid a much higher price for the bullion already coined than it would now fetch in any market.

The suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar will not depreciate its value, nor increase the value of the gold dollar. They will then both pass from hand to hand equally current in all of our business transactions, Confidence and stability will be restored to our commerce, to investments, to contracts. The laboring man will not be in dread of a pinched and depreciated dollar. The farmer will know that he is to receive for his grain and cattle money not a whit inferior to the money paid to farmers in any other country. The miseries of a fluctuating premium on exchange will not rise to vex the foreground of all business affairs. The retention of all of our five or six hundred millions of gold coin will be assured with the promise of more annual additions. And then we need not humbly seek foreign aid to float the world's product of silver, but wait until our aid has been sought, as sought it surely would be, to establish a potential bimetallic arrangement with the leading nations of Europe, by which any surplus of silver would have some chance of being utilized. The owners of the great silver bonanzas would not then have to rely for support upon the United States alone, but would have the major part of the commercial world promoting their permanent prosperity. It has been sufficiently demonstrated that the service of the whole Government for seven years in the coinage of our 24,000,000 of silver dollars annually has failed to increase the value of silver, but it is worth far less to-day than in 1878, when the experiment began. It must be equally obvious that it has also been a failure as a fertilizer to business—helping neither the farmer nor manufacturer to greater products nor to greater prices.

It is a pity that arguments on the silver question, upon either side, are so seldom listened to, except by those who may be in accord with the argument for the time presented, but are regarded as inapplicable and as foreign to the real merits of the subject as would be some algebraic problem or statistics on color-blindness. The fact that nearly all the merchants and trained business men of the country, whose daily life has afforded broad information upon the history and practical knowledge of the subject, are arranged upon the side favoring, at the very least, either an increase in the weight of the silver dollar, a limit to or a temporary suspension of its coinage, does not appear to have the slightest weight, but is contemptuously disregarded by those who theoretically and sentimentally cling first and last to the dollar of 412½ grains of silver. The fact that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer, the Director of the Mint, and the Comptroller of the Currency, the experienced Treasury officials, no less under the present Administration than under the preceding, are all agreed in urging Congress to cease the present coinage of the silver dollar, goes for nothing with the Senator from Kentucky and his obedient followers. Even the authority of Cernuschi, the foremost and most learned advocate of bimetallism in France, also goes for nothing when cited to show that the continued coinage of silver in the United States is calculated to defeat its maintenance at par with gold, and to defeat any concurrent agreement of nations by which a greater amount in the aggregate of silver might at once be brought into permanent circulation and universal acceptance. The facts obtained from our foreign ministers by the present Administration, all pointing to the absolute necessity of a suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar, are regarded with distrust, if not with pity, for those who attribute any importance to the wisdom or virtue of these functionaries. Such authorities as these, and the highest practically available, would have, when brought to bear upon any other subject, somewhat of a controlling influence; but on silver we are yet to see whether or not such authorities, all and the best our country affords, are to stand at zero in the United States Senate.

Is it possible that Americans will ever be contented with a monetary system which will subject us in all our foreign traffic to payments in gold for all we buy and to receive for all we sell nothing but silver? I do not know how it may be with others, but I confess that, should we ever sink to the level of those nations of the second, third, and fourth rank, whose wealth and enterprise is too inconsiderable to require all and the best monetary instrumentalities, including both gold and silver, in the conduct of trade and commerce, I should feel it to be a sad degradation, a complete surrender, of the proud position we now hold as the foremost power among great and enlightened nations.

[During the delivery of Mr. MORRILL'S remarks the hour of 2 o'clock arrived, when, by unanimous consent, the regular order was postponed and Mr. MORRILL allowed to conclude his speech.]

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senate to give me only ten minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that will be granted.

Mr. BECK. I believe there is no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection at all, but I desire to state that after the Senate gets through I wish to take up another bill, the Presidential count bill, and unless some other Senators desire to speak this afternoon I wish to submit an amendment and some remarks upon it.

Mr. BECK. I shall only occupy a few minutes; certainly not over fifteen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair). The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky. The resolution submitted by him will be regarded as before the Senate.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] on yesterday, at the close of a very able and elaborate speech made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], said:

> I merely desire to take the floor to say that rather reluctantly I shall feel it my duty to ask the attention of the Senate to-morrow for an hour on this subject, which seems to attract such an enthusiastic crowd of Senators here—I mean the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky.

I have listened to that speech, which he has so carefully prepared. I suppose it has required a month of elaborate study, and I agree that he ought to have been a little reluctant to present it. I think he will himself think so when he comes to examine it, and I think the country will understand, when they read it and consider it as the official reply to the arguments made on the other side, as the best the chairman of the Committee on Finance can do, and the best the Treasury officials can aid him in doing, that the monometallic position of the present and past administrations will not be very much advanced.

Why, sir, for the Senator from Vermont to tell the Senate, as he does, that the best way to increase the value of silver is to stop the coinage of it seems to me too absurd for serious consideration. Stop the coinage of it and thereby increase the value of it! Stop grinding wheat into flour to increase the value of wheat; stop allowing broadcloth to be used for clothes to increase the value of the material, would be quite as good an argument as the argument he now presents. I hardly know how to answer such suggestions. It is on a par with the arguments he has heretofore made on this floor, when he told the people of this country that they must stop the production of grain, that they were raising too much, that they were wearing out their lands, that the smaller quantity would bring them as much or more than the larger by making it scarcer and dearer.

Does not the Senator from Vermont know, does not every man know, that the moment we stop the coinage of silver we depreciate it that much more, because we deprive it of the use it now has at least to the extent of twenty-four million or twenty-eight million dollars a year in this country, and that we will by this process enable foreign nations to buy it as bullion that much cheaper? Does he not know that the power which stops the coinage now will ever afterward prevent its restoration to our coinage? That is the real object of the crusade which is now being made upon it.

When the Senator from Vermont says that he desires a bimetallic currency and desires to keep silver in circulation he hardly disguises the fact that he wants it for all but the bondholder and the national banker, he confesses that the so-called degraded coin he determines to keep in circulation is good enough for the laborer, good enough for the pensioner, good enough for everybody except the men who hold our bonds and who alone agreed to take it and covenanted that it should be paid to them at its present standard value. No other man ever made or required that agreement but the holders of our bonds, and they alone seek to repudiate their obligations, and have always been and are now sustained in doing so by our Treasury officials.

The Senator speaks of the present silver coinage as compulsory. True, it is compulsory coinage in one sense, and only in one sense; it is in fact a limited coinage, in derogation of a former right. This coin has been in the hands of its enemies for many years. From the day that the Congress of the United States, in 1878, declared that it should be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, every Secretary of the Treasury, every official, Republican and Democratic, that we have placed in power has been denouncing it and trying to put it down. We know that if Congress had not compelled them to coin at least $2,000,000 a month they never would have coined a dollar. To prevent that, Congress said that they should coin at least $2,000,000 a month; that they should buy that much silver, and now I and those who agree with me insist upon saying to them, knowing that they never would have bought a dollar's worth or coined a dollar, that they shall pay it out to all men who are compelled to receive it, bondholders included, as the law and the contracts require them to do.

That is all that we ask. We say that the bondholder and the national banker is no better and no more meritorious creditor of the Government than any other man, that he holds no higher obligations, and that our agents shall not assume that he does. The only struggle we are now making is to require our officials who have treated our silver coin as a step-child from the beginning until now to pay it out to the men who bargained for it, and who can pay it out to those who deal with them and who will pay it out when it is paid to them. We insist that it shall be paid to the men who agreed to take it and whose obligations on their very face required them to take it. That is all we are asking. No man can decently assert that there is anything wrong, unjust, unfair, or dishonest in that proposition. We know they are refusing in New York and elsewhere to receive it on deposit, and we propose to require them, as its owners, to seek to utilize it, instead of seeking to degrade it as they do now, when everybody takes it but themselves.

Yet we are told that we are trying to foist upon ignorant, unsuspecting people depreciated dollars; and Jay Cooke is paraded here as authority to show that what I said in regard to greenbacks and the original 5-20 bonds was untrue. Jay Cooke, it is true, was the agent of the Government, striving like all other agents to make a fortune out of his commissions; he was seeking to press sales by advertisements in every form. He, I repeat, is paraded here by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] as being absolute authority in the face of the law and to the subversion of the law, which they admit to be as I state it. We are told that I and other men like myself——

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me for one moment?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; to anybody.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Government of the United States made Jay Cooke the subscription agent of the Government, as the evidence is abundant that they did, and also the fiscal agent of the Government, and permitted Jay Cooke to spread broadcast over this land, in every newspaper in the land, the advertisement stating that the interest of the bonds was payable in gold, I claim, and justly claim, that the Government itself is a party to the terms of that contract, and of necessity a party to the fraud, if fraud there was.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Jay Cooke was bound by the law. This Government acts only through written laws. His advertisements could only be properly issued in accordance with the acts of Congress.

Mr. MCPHERSON rose.

Mr. BECK. Wait a moment. The present Secretary of the Treasury and all former Secretaries of the Treasury are bound by the law; yet, as if to show their contempt for it, they have never paid out a dollar of silver coin to any bondholder, although it was made a special fund for the payment of these very debts when received at the custom-houses; and now we are told by the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Vermont that because Jay Cooke once misquoted and Secretaries of the Treasury have for years defied the law and Congress did not and does not stop them, therefore the law is of no effect, and the obligations become what our agents have asserted that they are or should be by their violations of the solemn acts of Congress. That is the whole argument; there is nothing more in it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to say one word more, if the Senator from Kentucky will pardon me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. In the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky how many people investing in the bonds of the Government of the United States knew anything at all about the conditions of the law?

Mr. BECK. In answer to that, while I heard from the Senator from New Jersey the other day how helpless, how ignorant, how innocent, how little the people who invested in bonds knew about what they were doing, yet the fact remains that every greenback has written on the back of it, to be seen by every man who can read, that it is payable for all debts, public and private, at its face value except interest and customs dues. I presume every one of these poor bondholders could read, and in the face of the very bond they now hold is written that every one of them shall be and are lawfully and honestly payable in coin, gold and silver coin, of the standard value of July 14, 1870; and I assert, notwithstanding the pleas of ignorance and innocence, that any man who refuses to take it and any official who refuses to pay it is willfully violating the law, and is an untrustworthy agent to act for the people he represents. Do you tell me, or tell Congress and the country, when the greenback has written on its back that it will be receivable for the principal of the public debt, and when the bond of 1870 substituted for the 5.20 has written on its face that it can be honestly paid in coin, of gold or silver at the option of the United States, of the standard value of July 14, 1870, that the poor, innocent bondholder and banker did not know that to be the fact, and that our officials do not know that it is the fact? It is too bald and naked an absurdity to require a serious answer.

I do not desire to give silver any preference over gold; I desire to keep them together; but I insist that when the Treasury officials, who are the trustees of this people, and not the trustees of the bondholders, have a right to pay in gold or silver coin at their option, that the right to so pay makes it their duty to pay in the metal that is most beneficial to the tax-paying people they represent. If a trustee had the right to pay a debt for his cestui que trust in rye or wheat, and rye was worth 75 cents a bushel and wheat was worth a dollar a bushel, and the trustee should refuse to pay in rye and pay in wheat, he would be false to the man who trusted him as an agent to pay his debts, and any court would remove him for a violation of his known duty. It is our interest to make our coins of equal value and credit and to make them stay together; and when national banks will not receive silver dollars on deposit—when they will not receive silver certificates at the clearing-houses, although the law requires that they should—while as I said before I am not making war on them as men, I would forfeit every charter that was granted to them rather than to allow them to violate the law or avoid it by indirection, which is meaner and worse than a direct violation of it.

No man denies that silver stands on an equality with gold before the law, and no man denies that it has been treated as a step-child by every Treasury official at the dictation of the bondholders and bankers of the country. When Jay Cooke is brought before the Senate as evidence and authority I turn to the records of the country. I turn to the great speech made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the present presiding officer of this body, in this Chamber, on the 27th day of February, 1868, when a set of men were clamoring over Jay Cooke's certificates. Senators will find that he denounces all the people who made such demands as extortioners for daring to demand more than they agreed to receive at the time their contract was made. He as the leader of the Republican party then denounced them in this Hall. I read his letter when I spoke before. The Senator from Vermont carefully and studiously avoids any allusion to it, but refers to me as not being loyal to the Union party in 1870. The war ended two years before I came to Congress. I have endeavored to do my duty with the best lights before me, looking to the good of this whole country as earnestly as the Senator has. That is all I care to say as to that, but I will read again what the distinguished President of this body said months after he made that great speech in 1868 in a letter to a friend:

I think the bondholder violates his promise when he refuses to take the same kind of money he paid for the bonds. If the case is to be tested by law, I am right; if it is to be tested by Jay Cooke's advertisements—

As the two disagree, and the two distinguished Senators are driven to admit that Jay Cooke is the only authority they have to stand upon, I hope they will listen—

I am wrong. I hate repudiation, or anything like it, but we ought not to be deterred from doing what is right by fear of undeserved epithets.

If, under the law as it stands, the holders of the five-twenties can only be paid in gold, then we are repudiators if we propose to pay otherwise. If the bondholder can legally demand only the kind of money he paid, then he is a repudiator and extortioner to demand money more valuable than he gave.

JOHN SHERMAN.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield for one question now?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will he point me to some declaration made by the honorable gentleman whose letter he has just read, or any other Secretary of the Treasury from the time the bonds were first issued and given to the public, in which they disavowed in any way, shape, or form the advertisement of Mr. Jay Cooke? Was there ever a declaration made by any officer of this Government at any time or anywhere in which he said that the advertisement of Jay Cooke promising and pledging this Government to the payment of the interest of the bonds in gold was false?

Mr. BECK. That whole question is mere clap-trap. Mr. Jay Cooke was agent in 1865 and 1866. Here is the letter of Mr. SHERMAN in 1868. There was the great debate in Congress in 1868, when it was denied, and denied emphatically on this floor, that Mr. Jay Cooke had any right to make any such advertisement.

Mr. McPHERSON. The bonds had been originally issued on the advertisement. What has taken place since has simply been a renewal of the same bonds.

Mr. BECK. Is there anybody who denies now that the bondholders are obliged to take silver coin at the standard value of July 14, 1870?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not deny it; I believe that technically the bondholder is required to take his payment in silver coin, if you exact it.

Mr. BECK. Then, since we are questioning each other, is it not the duty of the Secretary when he has that silver coin in the Treasury and complains that he can not get it out, and it is made a special fund to pay that interest and bonds, so to pay it?

Mr. McPHERSON. No, sir; the practice of this Government from the time the bonds were issued up to the present hour has been to pay the obligations of the Government in gold. In 1853 you practically abandoned the coinage of silver. You had no silver then to pay with.

Mr. BECK. We had but a small amount of either silver or gold then. We had almost as much silver in one form or other as we had gold, and we had coined over $2,000,000 into standard dollars in the thirteen months before the act of 1873 was passed; the history of that fraud I do not care to go into. We had more silver than we had coined gold in this country up to 1849. We purchased Louisiana, we fought the war of 1812, we fought the Mexican war, and gained all the great countries from whence the gold came on substantially a silver basis. Because we discovered gold in California and it was discovered in Australia, more gold was produced for a time than silver; but is that an argument to lay before the Congress of the United States and either seek to annul the law or prevent a demand for the honest execution of a law in the interest of a few men who are no better than the humblest citizen in the land? I repeat that the moneyed corporations created by us and maintained by us have determined to defy us and control our action; that is the whole of it; and their aiders and abettors here and in the Executive Departments are doing the same thing. They are seeking, in order to enrich the bondholders at the expense of the country, to strike down half the coinage of the world. They propose to unite with England and Germany, two of the great creditor nations, while we ourselves are largely in debt on account of our rapid development, to strike down one-half the circulating and regulating medium of exchange in order to make the other half purchase twice as much property as it will now, and that too in the name of the Lord and in the interest of the poor! It is the baldest hypocrisy.

I have no patience with such pretenses when I hear Senators talk about the interest of the poor and the laborer, in view of the fact that the silver dollar to-day in Havana and everywhere is standing as high as the gold dollar, and when it is agreed that we have less than one-third of the silver coin that France has and maintains in spite of the efforts of those two great dominant nations. It is, I repeat, absurd to ask us to stop silver coinage now in order to double the purchasing power of gold, or, what is the same thing, to reduce all the value of all the property in this country one-half below what it is now in order to enrich a set of bankers and bondholders in Wall street, who are not producing anything, but gambling in the misfortunes of the laborers and producers of this country. If there is any set of men less indebted to the respect of Congress and the country than any other, it is the Wall street gambler, who corners bread, meat, anything, no matter who suffers so he thrives.

I can not properly take the time to answer the argument of the Senator from Vermont when he was telling about the present troubles of England and Germany, which he called free-trade countries. I could not but think that he might have said they are gold countries as well. They have stricken down the silver coinage as far as they dared, and the people of England went through from 1819 to 1840 such a condition as I hope this country will never see or feel after striking down her silver coin. Germany struck it down, when she thought she could humiliate France, after receiving a thousand millions of gold from her; she has been depleted year by year of her working people. On the average, 250,000 of her citizens have come to our shores to seek refuge from the grinding tyranny of the money policy of the German Empire.

Recollect when silver was stricken down in England the Parliament, as was said the other day, was owned by twenty or thirty men. The Duke of Newcastle sent five or six members, the Marquis of Westminster five or six more. The body was controlled by a few men; the German Empire is even now governed by a few men. This is a government of the people, and for the people, and by the people in theory, and I hope we shall maintain it in practice, and that it shall not become a government of bondholders, for bondholders, and by bondholders, in violation of the spirit of our Constitution.

But, Mr. President, I said I would not take more than five or ten minutes of the time of the Senate. I will close with the promise that I will answer the speech of the Senator from Vermont, even to his satisfaction, some of these days.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator from Kentucky has not really heard an able speech since he addressed the Senate on this question before, and I fear he never will again. The Senator from Kentucky, when he speaks, always speaks in capitals, but I think when we come to read his speech to-morrow in print it will be in the ordinary type, and it will not read any louder and more argumentative than other speeches.

It is rather singular that the Senator from Kentucky should have so misunderstood the propositions advanced by me. I never advanced the idea that by stopping the coinage of silver only we were to advance the price of it. It was only the argument that by ceasing to coin it for a space of time we might obtain the co-operation of other governments in using a larger amount.

But, Mr. President, I am not disposed to take up more time after having occupied so much as I have to-day. I will say that the Senator to-day, while he appears loud, yet, so far as his logic is concerned in reply to what I have said, has excited some of my sympathy in the same way as the child for its mother when he had just received a flogging from the mother and shed tears for the first time. He was inquired of what was the matter. "Why," said he, "I perceive, mother, you are growing weaker and weaker every time you flog me!" [Laughter.] That is my case with the Senator from Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. A few words.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to yielding for a while. I do not desire to talk on this question, but this debate goes on by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the debate is proceeding by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I only wish to say a few words. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the very remarkable statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. It is in keeping with every statement that has been made from the Treasury Department since 1878. I do not say of the speech made by the Senator from Vermont to-day that it is made for the purpose of deception, but I have said that as to every utterance of like character that came from the Treasury Department. The Senator makes the statement here, in the face of the record, that $165,000,000 of the $215,000,000 silver coined under the act of 1878 does not circulate and can not be circulated. The Senator is not ignorant of the fact that that is not technically correct. The President of the United States made the same statement in his message. Former Secretaries of the Treasury have made the same statement in their reports to the public. I say again it is not made by accident; it is not made by inattention. It is made for the express purpose, so far at least as Treasury officials are concerned, to mislead the public; and it has misled the public.

I have seen intelligent men in this country who were astonished when told that there were $140,000,000 of this silver in circulation. The honorable Senator did say in a few paragraphs below that there were $75,000,000 actually in the Treasury. He was compelled to make that statement in justice to himself. The first statement that he made will be paraded all over the country in every paper devoted to attacks upon silver coinage. The President's message was published everywhere with that part of it, and with the subsequent and later sentence eliminated. One hundred and sixty-five million dollars, we are told, are in the Treasury that can not be circulated. Does not the honorable Senator know that upon the same logic and upon the same method of reasoning there are $253,000,000 of gold that will not circulate and can not be put out. Is it fair for me to say that the $253,000,000 of gold will not circulate? Why, Mr. President, there are $93,000,000 of certificates in the hands of the people, and there are $31,000,000 there now in violation of law and contrary to the good faith and equity upon which the bill that they are now seeking to attack was passed in 1878.

There is not a man on this floor now who was on this floor in 1878 who does not know that it was the distinct understanding of this body that the whole sum we had named in that bill, $4,000,000 a month, was to be the silver coinage of this land. It was understood here that it would take up the entire production of this country. From the very hour that the bill became a law the hostility of the Treasury Department cut it down to $2,000,000 a month, and has kept it there from that time to this, with the exception of now and then a little more or a little less. The average coinage has only been about $24,000,000 a year, and we have been fed year after year with the statement that the silver would not circulate, and the Senator spent some time to show the great expense and outlay that the Government has been to in storing the silver and sending it out.

Why, Mr. President, the Government has made from 13 to 20 per cent. out of the people of the United States, I say in violation of fundamental law, in violation of good faith. The Government has no right to coin the people's money and make a profit thereon; and yet it has done so to the extent of more than $25,000,000; and the Senator tells us, as the bankers have told us recently from New York, that the Government is losing on the coinage of silver owing to the great expense it has been at to send it all over the country—the veriest bosh, the veriest nonsense, unfit for the Senate and unfit for any place where intelligence pervades and is the rule of conduct. The Government is ahead to-day more than $20,000,000 on the coinage of silver, with all its outlay for distributing it and for vaults that it has built in which to put it.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not wish to interrupt, but I do not know that I quite understand the Senator from Colorado. Who ought to have the twenty-five millions the Government has made—the owners of the mines?

Mr. TELLER. Who ought to have it? The people who owned the silver ought to have had it, as the people who own the gold have had it; and had we in 1878 passed a bill for the free and unlimited coinage of silver, as we ought to have done, in my judgment the people would have had it, and there would have been no contest before this body to-day as to the coinage of silver.

More than that, if the Treasury officials, when the act of 1878 passed, had attempted in good faith and with earnest endeavor to enforce the law and make gold equivalent to silver, as the French Government and French officials had done, there would to-day be no question. France can circulate, with eight hundred millions of gold, nine hundred millions of silver, and keep it at all times at par, when its silver coinage is worth 3 cents less on the dollar than ours. I say that it is unfair to come here with arguments of this kind, that tell the truth, but not the whole truth. We are entitled to have it go to the public that there are $140,000,000 of this money and not $65,000,000 in circulation, as the speech of the Senator would lead us to suppose.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think I heard him make use of a remark in which he said that the Government had made something over $20,000,000 out of this coinage. He spoke of it as though it were a virtue. If the Government has made over $20,000,000 out of it somebody must ultimately sustain a loss. Possibly it will be the citizens to whom the Government paid this money. Now, I wish to know if that is either honorable or honest.

Mr. TELLER. The honorable Senator could not have listened carefully to what I said. I did not say it was a virtue. I said it was in violation of fundamental principles that the Government should take my coin and coin it, pay me 80 cents on the dollar for it, and then send itout to the people at a hundred. Now I will answer the other branch of the honorable Senator's question: No man has lost a dollar who has taken a silver dollar. It has performed all the functions of a gold dollar everywhere and at all times. It will buy as much in any market in the world as the gold dollar will, and everywhere it is recognized to be the equal of the gold dollar, save and except when you come to touch the sacred character of the bondholder. When you touch him, then Senators say, "Oh, Jay Cooke stood up and published an advertisement, and because we did not understand the law we are not to be held to the strict letter of the law and we are to have gold."

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me one moment more?

Mr. TELLER. Of course.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am quite sure I understood the Senator aright when he made use of the expression that the silver dollar would buy in all the markets of the world as much as the gold dollar. Suppose he wanted to buy a thousand or ten thousand dollars' worth of goods in England to-day, from whom we are receiving a large amount of manufactured goods and against whose trade we find it necessary to close our ports by high tariffs. In the payment of those goods he offers the silver dollar, it to-day being issued at the rate of two millions a month from the Mint, and at what rate will the English merchant receive our silver dollars? Would they be taken at their bullion price or would they be taken upon the stamped value given them by the United States Mint? They would be taken only at the bullion value in the London market.

Mr. TELLER. Is the Senator through?

Mr. McPHERSON. I am through that much.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will go on. He will take it just according to the terms of the contract. If the American who wants to buy goods proposes to pay gold he can pay gold; if he agrees to pay silver he can pay silver; and if he does not agree to pay any specific thing he can pay silver under the law. If he goes to Great Britain with the silver, then I admit there is a difference between our silver dollar here and in Great Britain.

Mr. McPHERSON. One question more. The honorable Senator will certainly admit that in a European country whose mints are not open to the coinage of silver silver itself is simply merchandise. He must therefore necessarily admit that if we undertake to pay in silver, which is only merchandise in the countries from whom we make the purchase, then it would have exactly such a purchasing power as wheat, or cotton, or beef, or pork, or any other article of merchandise that we send to that market. A man who contracts to pay his debt in silver could no more know in advance how many silver dollars it would take to pay the debt than he would know how much cotton or wheat it would take to pay the same debt before the market price of the wheat or cotton was determined.

Mr. TELLER. I submit that is not a question. The honorable Senator may take the floor when I get through. In the first place, no matter how much silver you put in the dollar, when it goes abroad it goes as bullion. No matter how much gold you put in your gold dollar, it goes abroad as bullion. You do not circulate a gold dollar abroad any more than you do a silver dollar. I said that in this country no man had been cheated by the coinage of silver dollars, because that was the answer to the question. If the question is, whether it is honest to pay to the citizen a dollar of less than 100 cents, I reply now that no man in this country has been cheated, because he can exchange the silver dollar everywhere, if the law is properly enforced, for its equal, the gold dollar.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator has been very indulgent; and right in this connection I should like to make one further remark. The Senator will be so kind as to yield to me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Kentucky, I believe, in the short speech he made to the Senate to-day, took the ground that I at least was opposed to any coinage of silver because I was opposed to the further coinage of silver at this time. That was the deduction I drew from his remarks. Now, sir, I do not hold to that doctrine at all. I am in favor of just as much silver coin as can be kept on a legal par with gold.

The Senator from Colorado now says that the silver dollar will pay just as much of debt as the gold dollar. Very true; and why? Because there are not too many silver dollars in circulation to-day to enable them to be kept at a legal par with gold; but the Senator wishes to have the silver coinage increased to such an extent that it will be impossible to maintain a parity with gold. When the time arrives and we get to a silver basis, which the Senator by his hypothesis is really trying to drive this country to, then we shall have to measure all our transactions by silver, and not by silver upon its legal or stamped value, a value given to it by your law, but a value governed by the bullion market of the world.

Mr. TELLER. When we arrive at that stage it will be time enough for us to act. I recollect very distinctly sitting here day after day in 1878 and hearing the prophesies then made, coming, too, from the very Senator who has just dropped into his seat, that the very declaration that we proposed to coin the silver dollar would destroy the credit of the Government of the United States!

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to make a suggestion to him? In the year 1881, if I recollect aright, the Senator from New Jersey, because of his great apprehension that the day of judgment or of repudiation was to come, introduced a bill to stop the coinage of silver; and that very year the men of the West shipped to New York sixty-six millions in gold dollars and took silver certificates sustained by silver alone, and the Treasury stopped them from going further because it had no more silver dollars to give out.

Mr. McPHERSON. Do I understand the Senator from Kentucky to say that the people of the West sent in gold dollars for silver in that way?

Mr. BECK. I do.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not understand, from any facts I can get, that the people of the West ever sent any gold dollars here for silver certificates.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will yield, I will read exactly what the official report shows.

Mr. McPHERSON. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. BECK. I thought there was room for a good deal of information in regard to that.

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. The Treasurer in his last report said that $80,000,000 of gold coin had been exchanged for silver certificates.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very true.

Mr. BECK. On the 18th day of September, 1880, Mr. SHERMAN, then Secretary of the Treasury, issued a circular allowing the people of the United States to send gold to the subtreasury at New York and to receive silver certificates in lieu of it. In two months afterward, on the 1st day of November, 1880, the Treasurer of the United States said this:

The demand for silver certificates under the circular of the Department dated September 18, 1880, authorizing their exchange for gold coin and bullion, has been quite extensive at New Orleans, Saint Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati, and there were paid out at these points during the month of October $3,485,000 in silver certificates for an equal amount of gold coin deposited in the subtreasury in New York.

And still further, in December, 1881, after fourteen months had elapsed, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, said:

The Department has issued silver certificates at the several subtreasury offices, upon a deposit of gold coin in like amount with the assistant treasurer at New York, and through this means certificates have been issued for nearly all the silver held by the Treasury. These certificates amount to about $66,000,000 and are now outstanding.

And in a few days afterward the Secretary of the Treasury issued this order:

Until further notice the exchange of silver certificates for gold coin deposited at the office of the United States assistant treasurer at New York will be suspended and Department circular No. 75, of September 18, 1880, is hereby modified accordingly.

The men of the West had taken every dollar that could be covered by silver certificates, had sent at their own expense gold to New York to cover it until the Treasury stopped them from doing it, and at the same time that the Senator from New Jersey was introducing a bill to stop the coinage of silver because of the ruin that was going to come some time before the millennium!

Mr. MCPHERSON. Why did the people who deposited gold coin prefer silver certificates to gold certificates?

Mr. BECK. Because one was as good as the other, and there was no gold lying in the Treasury to cover it, and they regarded silver as good as gold, and there were sixty-odd millions of silver in the Treasury, and that was there for that purpose, and they took the silver certificates and were glad to have that security.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I will conclude my remarks and the Senator can make his afterward.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Only one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. I will for a moment, but not for an extended speech, because I agreed not to detain the Senate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I promise not to interrupt the Senator again; but what the Senator from Kentucky has said requires an answer right in this connection. Does the Senator from Kentucky say that the vast amount of gold, of which he speaks, was sent from the West to the subtreasury in New York and deposited there for the purpose of getting silver certificates?

Mr. BECK. I do.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Let me tell the Senator exactly what was done. The Senator knows very well that for a long time past there has been a large increase of the gold reserve in the banks of New York. They have been apprehending exactly such trouble as is now being forced on the country by the continuance of silver coinage. What do they do? They have deposited their gold in the subtreasury of New York; the original certificate has been sent to the Treasury at Washington, and a silver certificate has been issued upon that and charged against the silver in the Treasury. Now, then, what becomes of the certificate? At a certain time when a vast amount of currency is needed at different places in the West to move the crops, as the Treasury itself agrees and takes upon itself the responsibility and cost of transporting these certificates to the West without cost to the bankers, the bankers then trade silver certificates for exchange. Why? Because they needed exchange. All the West and South needed currency. The bankers bring the exchange to New York and recoup themselves out of the exchange there. In other words, the banker makes a handsome financial transaction by depositing his gold, which he did not wish to use, for the purpose of getting certificates and making a profit between exchange and certificates.

Mr. TELLER. I will not yield any longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado declines to yield.

Mr. BECK. One word and I am done. The Secretary shows that in the first month after the order of September, 1880, from New Orleans, Saint Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati, $3,485,000 were sent to New York in gold and silver certificates taken, and the next year $66,000,000 received in all, when they stopped the allowance of it, and the Senator from New Jersey was then predicting what would happen some time between now and the final dissolution of things.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is in possession of the floor.

Mr. TELLER. I did not intend to detain the Senate to any great length. I am not responsible for colloquy that has passed on the other side of the Chamber.

I was proceeding to say, when interrupted, that I had heard the identical argument in 1878 which is now being presented, that there is great danger ahead. It was declared that the danger would be just as great the moment we authorized the issue of silver dollars as it would be at any other time. It was asserted here by all the enemies of the silver dollar that the very fact that we passed such a bill would ruin the credit of the Government. And now the Senator from New Jersey says that the bankers have been hoarding their gold anticipating just such trouble as now exists in the financial world. I challenge the Senator, with all his great financial learning, to show me that there has ever been a time in the history of this country from the very moment that we began to administer public affairs to this hour when there has been so satisfactory a financial condition as there is to-day. There is more gold in the country among the people, there is more in the banks, there is more of everything that goes to make a country rich and prosperous than there ever was at any other time; and there is no pretense, outside of banks and bankers and brokers and the Treasury Department, that there is a financial panic ahead.

Mr. MAXEY rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. For a moment.

Mr. MAXEY. It was predicted that the opening of the discussion on silver in December last would have the effect of depreciating the credit of the Government, lower the price of bonds, and cause the export of gold. What is the fact? The credit of the Government never was better, bonds never higher, and the little "ring" fixed up to export gold last December in order to produce an effect was a dead failure.

Mr. TELLER. On an average, every month since the bill of 1878 was passed there has come to this country $5,000,000 more of gold than has gone out, besides what we have coined; and yet Senators, whose great financial knowledge, I suppose, comes from the fact that they are members of the Committee on Finance—for they show it in no other way, I am certain—stand up here and talk about the danger that is threatened and that the bankers have been getting themselves ready for this financial disaster! The bankers have put in their vaults since 1878 from $22,000,000 to $175,000,000 of gold, not because they needed it, not because they anticipated trouble, but because they believed it would appreciate whenever they could break down silver coinage; and the honorable Senator from New Jersey has been the champion of those people on this floor. It was he who introduced the bill for the repeal of silver coinage. It was that side of the question, that class of persons who introduced this discussion here, and not the silver men of the West or the South.

Now, Mr. President, I am not going into any extensive discussion. I did not mean to speak three minutes when I got up. The honorable Senator from Vermont alluded, I think in a very unkind way, to the men who advocate silver as if they were repudiationists, and as if they had some latent, hidden design to destroy the credit of the Government. Why, Mr. President, that is an unfair argument on this floor. Each Senator here is presumed by law, and he ought to be presumed otherwise, to be equally patriotic with any other; and I, for the people whom I represent, repudiate any idea that we want to scale public or private debts. We are as loyal to the Government, to its honor, to its integrity, as any people in the world. We gave to the Government, to save it in its hour of distress, more men in proportion to our population than any State in the Union. We are just as loyal as the people of Vermont; we have the same interest in the stability and integrity of the United States that they have; but we have been educated in a school which teaches us that there are other men who have rights besides the men who hold the credits. I do not care whether it be said that the laborer is the creditor or who it may be, the man who has contracted to pay has contracted an obligation that he is bound to fulfill to the letter, and the man who has contracted to receive it is under the same obligation to receive it to the letter. When we said the bonds were payable in coin and the present holders took them, they took them to be paid in silver, if we did not have gold, or if the Government preferred. It is neither dishonest nor impolitic, and I am, with the Senator from Kentucky, in favor of keeping the good faith of the Government and paying the bonds according to the spirit of the law.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 91) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont calls for the regular order, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to take the floor on the electoral-count bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Pending which I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday were read and approved.

CLAIM OF ELIZABETH CARSON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Quartermaster-General upon the claim of Elizabeth Carson and recommending its payment; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the president of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, transmitting the annual report of receipts and disbursements for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

RED CLOUD AND RED LEAF INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation to pay the Red Cloud and Red Leaf bands of Sioux Indians in Dakota for ponies taken by the military in 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SALARIES OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 6) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MANAGER NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a joint resolution (S. R. 31) appointing John F. Hartranft a manager of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF A BILL.

Mr. LONG, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw a bill (H. R. 1086) for the relief of John Dolan, a similar bill having been already introduced.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SCRANTON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for the remainder of this week, on account of important business.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to submit a privileged report, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, have considered the same, and have instructed me to make a favorable report thereon and to recommend its passage:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered by the committee during the present Congress.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR THE COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, also submitted the following privileged report:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it favorably and to recommend its passage:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor are hereby authorized to have printed such letters or circulars as they may deem necessary for the obtaining of information for the use of the committee.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSISTANT FOLDER IN SEAL-ROOM.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Accounts to submit a privileged report and ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the following resolution of Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois—

"Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be authorized to employ James D. Ryan as assistant folder in the seal-room, and pay him at the rate of $2.50 per day out of the contingent fund of the House until further ordered"— have considered the same, and respectfully report the following substitute and recommend its adoption:

"Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be authorized to employ James D. Ryan as assistant folder in the seal-room of the House at the rate of $2.50 per day during the present session, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, I would state, for the information of the House, that the seal-room is the room in the rear of the House, where documents are folded for immediate use and dispatch. This resolution proposes to employ the same young man as assistant folder who was employed in that capacity in the last Congress. The Committee on Accounts think the employment of this additional folder is a necessary provision for the convenience of members of the House. I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a suggestion. I submit that the Doorkeeper is the proper person to appoint these folders. It seems to me the House of Representatives is falling below its proper function when it undertakes to do a matter of this kind. I object to this House undertaking to supersede the proper authority of the officers of the House and appoint their subordinates. These principal officers whom we select are responsible for their subordinates; we hold them accountable for their conduct. I move, therefore, to amend this resolution by striking out so much as names the person to be appointed, and by inserting a provision that the Doorkeeper appoint an additional folder if necessary.

Mr. SPOONER. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], I will say that formerly there were two men employed in the performance of this duty in the seal-room. During the Forty-eighth Congress it was found that the employment of this young man at a less salary than had been paid would secure the efficient performance of the service in that room. Hence the employment of this young man was in the line of economy. He has given perfect satisfaction, I doubt not, to the Doorkeeper as well as to all having business in that room.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to add a word to what I have already stated. Whenever we undertake to appoint by a vote of the House subordinate officers the object, I take it for granted, is to confer a personal favor on some particular individual. We ought to act with reference to the good of the public service, and not undertake to pension our friends upon the House. If we permit the Doorkeeper to judge when he needs help and allow him to select the men for whose conduct he is to be responsible, we are likely to have efficient service; but when we undertake to appoint these subordinate officers, whether they are needed or not, we may accommodate friends, but we may not be serving the public. I trust we shall amend the resolution as I have proposed.

Mr. SPOONER. I assure the gentleman from Texas that there is no design on the part of the committee to favor any particular person by this appointment, but merely to secure the selection of a young man who has shown himself to be abundantly able to perform the duties required, and who discharges them at less salary than has been paid for the same service.

Mr. REAGAN. If he has performed his duty, the Doorkeeper knows it better than does this House or that committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER], who has this resolution in charge, will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. I fully sympathize with the declaration made by the gentleman from Rhode Island in behalf of the committee that the committee had no desire to display any favoritism. The gentleman who originally introduced the resolution named this young man, I suppose, for the reason stated by the gentleman from Rhode Island, that he had displayed conspicuous ability in this service in the last Congress. But it seems to me the objection made by the gentleman from Texas is well taken. This House ought not to undertake to designate any particular person as a subordinate in any branch of our service. I think that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas will be acceptable to the House, and that the Doorkeeper, recognizing the conspicuous ability of the young man in question, will reappoint him. I hope the gentleman from Rhode Island will accept the amendment, and then I think there will be no objection on this side of the House.

Mr. SPOONER. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], a member of our committee, I will, unless some other member of the committee objects, assent to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The House must vote on the amendment, because it is proposed as an amendment to the report of the committee.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. REAGAN, it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the substitute reported by the committee as amended.

A MEMBER. Let the substitute be read as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be authorized to employ an assistant folder in the seal-room of the House at the rate of $2.50 per day during the present session, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The substitute as amended was agreed to; and the report of the committee as amended was adopted.

Mr. SPOONER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WAIT. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. BEACH. I shall object.

Mr. WAIT. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] when he hears the resolution will not object.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, there is a day set apart for the introduction of bills and resolutions. The gentleman from Connecticut has only to wait three days in order to introduce his resolution. I maintain my objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the matter is not before the House.

Mr. MILLARD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill——

Mr. BEACH. I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] objects, and has given notice that he will object to all requests for unanimous consent for the introduction of measures for which a day is assigned under the rules of the House.

Mr. MILLARD. I hope the gentleman will not object to this. It is a bill in the interest of the laboring men of his own State.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will proceed to call the committees for reports to be placed upon the appropriate Calendars.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SHAKOPEE, MINN.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1245) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Shakopee, Minn.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LIEUT. WILLIAM P. RANDALL.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

RETIREMENT OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. BALLENTINE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 339) authorizing the voluntary retirement of certain officers of the United States Navy who have rendered conspicuous services in battle or who have served thirty years in the Navy; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask, by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the report made by the Committee on Pacific Railroads at the last session of Congress, numbered 1431, together with the minority report, be printed in the RECORD, the copies on file being exhausted.

The SPEAKER. That is not a report which can come in under this call. The gentleman will retain it for the present and he can submit his request hereafter.

BENJAMIN M. SIMPSON.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. 61) for the relief of Benjamin M. Simpson, with an amendment; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the bill and amendment, together with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CALL OF COMMITTEES FOR ACTION ON BILLS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of standing and select committees for reports, and the Chair will now proceed with the call of committees for the consideration of bills for one hour. The hour begins at twenty-two minutes to 1 o'clock.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS OF WIDOWS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

Mr. MATSON. I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which has been read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the rate of pension for widows, minor children, and dependent relatives now on the pension-roll, or hereafter to be placed on the pension-roll, and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $12 per month; and nothing herein shall be construed to affect the existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of sixteen years. And all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That no claim agent or attorney shall be recognized in the adjudication of claims under this act, nor shall any such person be entitled to receive any compensation whatever for services or pretended services in making applications thereunder.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, the bill which has been read has been very thoroughly considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in this Congress and reported unanimously by that committee. The same committee in the Forty-eighth Congress considered the same proposition and reported it unanimously. The provisions of the bill are very simple. It provides that widows of soldiers—not of officers, but of soldiers—who are receiving a less rate of pension than $12 per month shall be increased to $12 per month. The increase in nearly all cases is from $8 to $12 per month. There are a very few cases, perhaps less than twenty in number, upon the pension-roll, in cases of the widows of warrant officers of the Navy, where $10 per month is given, but the substantial provision of this bill is an increase of pensions of widows of soldiers from $8 a month to $12 a month.

The provisions of the bill also apply to dependent fathers and mothers who are drawing pensions on account of the death of their sons.

Mr. Chairman, I apprehend the proposition in reference to which this House wishes to be informed is as to what this is going to cost the people and the Government. A very careful estimate was made less than two years since based upon the number of this class of pensioners upon the roll, an estimate based, too, upon the number of applications then pending of that kind, and the total cost was estimated by a gentleman who was thoroughly familiar with the Pension Office, having served there for twenty years and having been chief of the miscellaneous division, whose duty it was to make such estimate for the benefit of the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior, and he fixed the cost at something over $5,000,000—less than $6,000,000.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Does my colleague mean to say that will be the total cost at the end of the term or that will be the annual cost?

Mr. MATSON. It will be that much added to the annual cost of the pension-roll.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That the annual cost will be that sum?

Mr. MATSON. That the annual cost will be that much. The question then is as to whether the representatives of the people here are prepared to say the Government can pay that sum of money to that worthy class of people. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have answered it in the affirmative, and I think I may say the Committee on Invalid Pensions is not in favor of every wild proposition of pension legislation which may be suggested to them. I think they have shown a degree of moderation in recommendations to this House, and I feel perfectly sure as to this proposition there can be but little division on either side of this House.

Here is a proposition to add $4 a month to the pension of widows and of old men and old women of this country—to those who have lost their husbands and to those who have lost their sons upon whom they expected to lean in their old age. This is a very moderate proposition.

I wish to say further in relation to this matter that this rate of $8 was passed in 1816, just after the war of 1812, and at that time it was the full pay of the soldier. This Government thought then when the soldier was killed in battle or gave his life to the country in any way his widow should be entitled to receive the pay her husband was receiving when he was in the Government service. Since that time the pay of a private soldier has been increased and has varied from eleven to thirteen and up to sixteen dollars a month. The proposition has been urged upon Congress to follow out the original principle and to give to these widows and dependent parents the same pay that the soldier was receiving at the time he lost his life; but the committee thought it fit and wise to compromise by adopting a sum which bore a relation between the two extremes which had been paid, and therefore we have fixed upon a sum that is between the highest and the lowest rates paid for the service of the soldier, $8 being the lowest and $16 the highest.

There is another thing, Mr. Chairman, to which I desire to call the attention of the committee, and that is that this bill applies to all widows of the soldiers of the wars in which this country has been engaged who are now on the rolls, and there is not a community throughout all the length and breadth of this land in which there is not some humble home in which light and joy will be shed by the action of this Congress in passing this bill. Eight dollars a month at this time, when it costs more to live than it did when the rate was fixed by law, is not enough to support these old people. These widows and dependent relatives are growing old. I have received, I may safely say, since this proposition has been pending in Congress, thousands of letters from all parts of the country from these old women addressed to me, some of the writers stating that they were then over ninety years of age, all of them begging and asking this additional $4 a month in order to enable them to live comfortably or with a little more comfort during the few remaining years of their lives. Now I have said this much in explanation of this bill and I apprehend that there will be no very serious opposition to its passage.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that this embraces the widows of the war of 1812 and of the Mexican war?

Mr. MATSON. The bill is drawn to include all the widows who are now upon the pension-roll at the rate specified.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I would ask if this bill as drawn applies to the widows of soldiers whether they lost their lives in the line of duty or from disease contracted in the service?

Mr. MATSON. It does not change the pension law as far as the right to receive a pension is concerned at all. It only changes the rate of pension to those who receive the sum indicated.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But it enlarges the number of those who will be entitled to pension.

Mr. MATSON. No, it does not.

Mr. REAGAN. Permit me to ask the gentleman if there is any estimate as to the increased expenditures which this bill will involve?

Mr. MATSON. I have already stated to the committee, but I presume the gentleman from Texas was not in his seat at the time, that it is estimated, and a very careful estimate has been made, that it will increase the expenditures for pensions between five and six millions of dollars annually.

Mr. HOLMES. May I ask the gentleman a question? Does this increase apply to those receiving pension under special acts of Congress?

Mr. MATSON. It applies to all persons who are on the pension-roll who come within its provisions as to rating, or those who may hereafter be placed upon the roll at the rate specified.

Mr. HOLMES. Under the term used in granting a special pension, "according to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," they will get $12 a month?

Mr. MATSON. Of course that will be the effect.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. The rate of compensation to private soldiers during a portion of the war was as much as $16 a month, I believe.

Mr. MATSON. I think so; in fact, I know it was.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Now I am warmly for the $12 a month as provided by this bill; but let me ask if it would not be wise for the Committee on Invalid Pensions to go a step further, and give the rate of pension to these widows and old parents that was paid to the soldier at least during a part of the time he was in the service, $16 per month?

Mr. MATSON. I have already stated that that was urged upon the committee, but the committee thought it the right thing to compromise the matter and fix the rate of pension between the highest sum paid and the lowest.

The husbands of some of these widows never received $16 per month while in the service; many of them received but $13, and we fixed on $12 as a compromise. That seems to be a fair increase, which we hope will obtain.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit amendments?

Mr. MATSON. I have no power to prevent amendments. I hope, however, the gentleman will allow me to say I hope that this bill will not be amended except in so far as it relates to the subject-matter with which it deals. If the gentleman from Indiana is in favor of this bill, I hope he will allow it to stand as it is—at least allow it to relate to one subject-matter. The proposition to combine different subjects in relation to pensions will combine all opposition to the bill. This is a measure nearly all of the House concurs in; but if you fasten upon it some other proposition irrelevant to it you will bring against it opposition that would not otherwise exist. Therefore I beg my friend not to offer an amendment not relating to the subject-matter of the pensions of widows and dependent parents.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am very distinctly favorable to the bill reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions and now before us. In a very humble way I labored a good long Sabbath day, just at the close of the last session, to get certain gentlemen to consent that the House might take a vote on the proposition.

It came here from the other end of the Capitol. We could not secure a vote for it then, and I am glad we are able to secure one upon it now.

I should regret exceedingly to offer any proposition that would endanger a bill the provisions of which I consider so just as those of the one under consideration.

Mr. MATSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Not at this moment. I wish to say I have a proposition connected directly with the question of pensions that is eminently just. We have been telling the soldiers of this country, I think all of us at least in the northern section, that at the earliest opportunity we would put it through the Congress of the United States; and that is the repeal of an unwarrantable discrimination against a portion of the soldiers of the Republic.

A few years ago we passed a law reported by a Democratic committee to this House, supported by the Democratic party here and put into the platforms of the Democratic party in their political campaign, and that is, that pensions should date back to the time of the incurrence of the disability or the discharge from the service of the United States because of it. We paid one hundred and fifty or two hundred million dollars under this just and beneficent Democratic measure; but by the act of Congress the provisions of the bill so far as they related to arrearages stopped on the 1st of July, 1880. Soldiers who have presented their claims since then, and even those who had claims pending at that time but who have been compelled since then to amend them so as to correctly describe their disability, have been prohibited from receiving pensions from the Treasury except from the time when the application was made.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Indiana and to the House whether there ought to be any discrimination made against these men simply because they were willing to delay the presentation of their just claims against the Government, hoping that their condition in life might be such that they could live without appealing either to the justice or the charity of the nation. I know men who came from the battlefields of the Republic halting upon their canes or walking upon their crutches who said they would never ask a pension from the Government, and they have not done so until their necessities, the wants of their families, their wives, their children, have compelled them to ask this at the hands of the nation they served.

I want to know now if the gentlemen on the other side are willing to repeal the proviso to the second section of the act making appropriations for the payment of arrears of pensions adopted in the year 1879. I have prepared an amendment, which I will send to the desk.

Mr. MATSON. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] that the offering of amendments will not be in order till general debate has closed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The amendment then may be read at this time from the desk as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as general debate is closed it will then be in order for the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will offer it at the proper time if I get recognition.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Add:

"SEC. 3. That the proviso to the second section of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the payment of arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879,' approved March 3, 1879, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I feel as much interest in the proposition offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], which involves the repeal of the proviso to the arrears act, as it is possible for me or for any other member on this floor to feel. For years, as a member of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic, I have been laboring to bring about this legislation.

But I want to say simply this at this time. The bill under consideration is a bill about which there seems to me to be no controversy whatever. It has been embodied substantially in every proposition bringing about the needed reform of the defective and blundering legislation of the country that has been submitted to Congress for the past ten years. It stands alone. It is no part of a system necessarily. Everybody is in favor of its passage who is in favor of affording some remedy and some relief to this class of pensioners of the country. There are a great many other propositions, Mr. Chairman, that have already been submitted to this House, and there are many more to be submitted, and the whole of them, or a large majority of them at least, will ultimately become a sort of code involving, if intelligent legislation is to prevail, a change of the whole system upon which pensions hitherto have been granted. Among these are the equalization of bounties and the repeal of the proviso to the arrears act, but they stand in such a position, the one to the other, that it is necessary and proper that ultimately the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall evolve out of the mass of legislation some systematic scheme or proposition. I know not what their purpose is, but it is enough for me to know that here is a single proposition everybody is in favor of, which comes in such a form that it can be adopted now; which comes in such a form that, if passed in the House, it will speedily be passed in the Senate and become a law of the country.

The future legislation which I shall advocate, and which others will advocate, will in no wise collide or be inconsistent with this. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to impede the possibility or probability of the passage of this bill by at this time considering any amendment to it that is not to perfect the bill itself. In other words, I stand in that sort of position where I feel that I have no hesitation about voting against this amendment, notwithstanding that the amendment itself is one that lies nearer to my heart than perhaps any other one that can be offered in this House. But I want to wait until the proper time comes and take these measures as they come from the committee and pass them as rapidly as we can.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] ought not to pass, and I regret very much that for reasons which seem to me proper I shall be placed in the same attitude to the bill itself that has been reported from the committee. My reasons for opposing the proposition coming from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] may be briefly stated thus: No soldier who suffered a disability sufficient to entitle him to a pension at the hands of the Government failed to know it for twenty years after the war, or waited until he had to be spurred up by some claim agent in the city of Washington who reminded him that he had been disabled for twenty years and ought to draw a pension for that time. That is my objection to the gentleman's proposition. I object to the bill, not because I do not recognize the fact that there is a class of widows who should be entitled to greater pensions than they now draw, but I object to it for two reasons. First, I hold that the whole system of pensions should be reorganized. A bill should be introduced and should become a law which would make the system harmonious. The Pensions Committee of this House ought, in my judgment, to perfect and present such a bill; but the special acts which are being passed from time to time, piecemeal by piecemeal, instead of harmonizing our pension laws, make them, from session to session, more unequal and incongruous.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, "total disability" of a soldier—and what can be greater than that—is pensioned at $8 a month, while we have classifications of pensions for private soldiers that run up as high as $70 a month. Many of those who are drawing such pensions, although disabled by the loss of a leg or an arm, are still able to earn a livelihood, and many of them do earn a livelihood. But the poor soldier who was shot through the body and totally disabled, rendered unable to do a day's work, what does he get? Eight dollars a month. "Total disability" stands graded at the highest notch and draws the lowest pension! How comes this? It grows out of the fact that legislation precisely like this which is now proposed has been enacted from time to time for the benefit of special classes. Some one hundred persons apply for a special rate for a particular kind of wound, and state that there are no more than one hundred such cases, and they ask a pension of $16 or $20 a month. Another class apply, and there are only perhaps two hundred of them, and they want $24 a month. Nobody wants to vote against the soldier, and the claimants go on the roll at that rate.

Another class have applied, and they are allowed $36 a month; another class have applied, and they get $50 a month; another class have applied, and they get $70 a month; while the poor broken-down veteran, who did not happen to be injured in the exact place and manner that these special acts describe, gets only $8 a month. Sir, it is a shame and disgrace to this people that such inequalities of pension exist. It would be better for us to pass a general bill repealing all existing laws upon the subject and then to pass an act that would grade these pensions and make them as they ought to be, in accordance with the disability that the soldier has received. Another objection I have to this bill is that it provides for all widows now on the pension-roll or who may hereafter go upon the pension-roll. I am opposed to that. We are still paying pensions to the widows of the soldiers of 1812, and after a time we shall reach a like point in regard to the widows of the soldiers of the last war. For example, you find a widow of a soldier of the war of 1812 on the pension-roll, and when you look into the facts you find that some old man, seventy or seventy-five years of age, married a young girl who took care of him during the last two or three weeks of his life, and then got herself placed on the pension-roll as the widow of a soldier. Now this bill should provide only for the widows of soldiers who were killed in action, or, if it should be further extended, it should be only to those cases where the woman was married to the man before he was on the verge of the grave.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield for a question?

Mr. BRAGG. Certainly, sir.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he has any objection to old veterans marrying young girls? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; no, sir. It shows a quality that every good soldier was remarkable for, love of the sex. But, sir, I have objections to these young misses becoming soldiers' widows to such an extent as to fasten themselves as pensioners upon the Treasury of the United States. A young girl may marry an old man, and I think very much of her when she marries him for love; but when she marries him for ducats, then all my respect for her is gone. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, yesterday the House was very much concerned on the score of economy about the appointment of a clerk to one of our committees, involving a possible expenditure of perhaps $700 or $800 a year. Now, there is pending here to-day a proposition which, it is admitted, will cost annually some five or six million dollars—which possibly may involve four or five times that amount; and it seems it is to go through the House almost unchallenged.

Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to paying pensions to soldiers or to the widows of soldiers, but I do believe that our taxation ought to be so arranged that the wealth of this country will contribute something to sustain those whom the fortunes or misfortunes of war have made dependent upon the aid of the Government. The wealthy people escaped all the privations and sufferings of that great struggle. They staid at home and husbanded their resources, or they shipped their wealth out of the country. As soon as the war was over they came, by their representatives, into this House and had all the taxation they were bearing taken off their shoulders. Sir, since the war closed Congress has repealed $300,000,000 of taxation; yet it persistently refuses to take into consideration the needs of the poor people of this country and reduce the burden of taxation resting upon them. The first tax that passed away, one which was characterized as the "most obnoxious," the "most odious," the "most oppressive to a free people," was the tax on incomes. The tax upon those great fortunes that had grown up in this country, showing $800,000,000 or $900,000,000 accumulated in one year in the hands of four or five hundred thousand people, was swept away in this House almost without discussion. Yet the tax on the garments the poor people wear in the coldest weather of winter is clung to in this House with dogged pertinacity. One after another the taxes paid by the wealthy classes have been cut down until, in the Forty-seventh Congress, this House with heroic fortitude came forward and relieved the sufferings of the manufacturers of playing cards! The duty was so onerous, and upon a subject of such vital concern to all the people of the country, that the internal-revenue tax on playing cards was in the interest of public morality swept away! But at the same time the tax of 100 per cent. on imported playing-cards was continued in order to give some one a monopoly of the trade. All the revenues of this Government derived from wealth have one after another been swept away, until substantially the whole burden of taxation rests upon the implements of labor, upon cotton and woolen goods, and such things as the necessities of the people demand day by day.

We are called upon to maintain a vast pension establishment. I am not opposed, I repeat it, to the payment of pensions to soldiers and their widows. It is a debt of gratitude that every country owes to its gallant defenders and those who are dependent upon them. But our own intelligence, our duty to our constituents, and our duty to our country require that we should reimpose the taxation on the wealth of the country and compel it to bear at least some part of the burden necessary to sustain the pension establishment of this country.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the political party that shall from any motive defeat the passage of this bill assumes a responsibility in which I shall not share. I am not going to answer any gentleman who takes this occasion to discuss the tariff; neither will I be drawn into a discussion of the amendment which my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has incorporated in his remarks.

I am in favor of that amendment, but not to the pending bill, which it may defeat. Earnestly do I concur in the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I have given evidence of it by introducing a bill to repeal the limitation in regard to the payment of arrearages. My State is in favor of it. The political party of which I am a member declared in its last convention in our State in favor of the repeal of that limitation. But, as has been so ably stated by the gentleman from Ohio, there are many measures which appeal to the patriotic heart and the just mind in favor of the soldier, but which can not be incorporated in the present bill. Let them in their order be taken up and fairly met.

I see an opportunity for political advantage perhaps by forcing this amendment upon the House; but I do not ask that advantage. I want no better advantage for my political party than that it give its earnest support, without hesitation, without let or hinderance, to this proposition in favor of the women of this country whom the war has deprived of their natural and legal support in their hard struggle for existence. It at best can go but a short distance toward their support, and can never compensate for the great losses that they have sustained.

I am glad that the rules of the House give us this opportunity to meet this question, and I appeal to all gentlemen here to look this question fairly in the face. Here are a number of people to be benefited who are without votes, without political influence, and who appeal to us simply as those crushed and deserving beings who need the aid of generous and just legislation.

I do not sympathize with that class of men that seek on every occasion to hurl a hobby into the debates here. I think we can commend ourselves to the Republic as legislators if we will meet propositions with an eye single to the interests that are involved.

God knows that I believe every soldier should be pensioned from the hour he was injured. God knows that I can with a clear conscience vote to give to the widows, fathers, and mothers provided for in this bill $16 a month; and that amendment I would offer to this bill but for the fact that I would not lay a single straw in the way of the speedy adoption of this proposed legislation. My hope now is that the gentleman in charge of this bill will take such action as will enable the intelligence to be sent over the wires to-night that the House of Representatives has passed this just legislation.

Under the present rules we can meet the other propositions in due time and in proper form. If we now put in one amendment the temptation is presented to offer another and another. I can think of several that I could urge with all earnestness and energy upon this House. But I appeal to every gentleman here to allow this bill, untrammeled and unweighted with any other proposition, to be passed, and passed now. This done, we can address ourselves to other considerations.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] raises objections which I will not stop to discuss. The pertinent question of my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] suggests enough to meet the judgment of every one here. If the gentleman will allow me I will say that it is beneath his own broad mind to raise such an objection to the proposed legislation, to wit: that the motive is to be analyzed that enters into the mind of a woman who links her destiny with a crushed or crippled soldier of the Republic.

I appeal to the members of this House to lay aside all such suggestions, and to consider those only which are pertinent to the issue. Let us promptly pass this bill. I assure each and all that in these remarks I do not mean to make any imputation against the motives of any gentleman on either side of this House. I appeal for a class who have written letters to me by the hundred asking for this increase of pension. And with these remarks, Mr. Chairman, I submit the time now is to act. Let us act promptly, patriotically, and now especially when the question is legitimately before us. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLFORD was recognized.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will do so with pleasure.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Iowa had surrendered the floor, and the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] to address the committee.

Mr. CANNON. I was trying to propound a parliamentary inquiry to the gentleman from Iowa. I rose in my place to ask the gentleman to yield to me five minutes of his time. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I did not get the recognition from the Chair I believe to be proper. It seems to me I was in time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I hope there will be no objection to my yielding five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had yielded the floor and the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Kentucky. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] and for the purpose of advocating the bill presented for our consideration by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House. It is well known no doubt to the members of the last Congress who are also members of this that I am in favor of granting pensions to our soldiers and sailors at higher rates than are now allowed by the law. It is equally well known, I presume, that I am also in favor of granting arrearages of pension. I believe in the right and justice of giving to the men who fought the battles of this country and who endured hardships and suffered wounds in our defense, and to the widows and dependent mothers and fathers of those who died in battle, a rate of pension higher than that now allowed, and one more commensurate with the heroic services of those gallant men.

I intend, Mr. Chairman, when I have time, to present my views fully as to the propriety of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], and also in reference to other changes of the pension laws in the interest of doing justice to those to whom the country is so deeply indebted. I hold to the belief that the widows of those gallant men who have fought the battles of their country in any war, at any time, under any circumstances, are entitled to at least $15 per month.

In response to the argument made by my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS] I have only to say that because the tariff ought to be reduced and goods of all sorts made cheaper to the people and because that legislation is delayed is no good reason why the widows of our soldiers and sailors who died in the service should not only be compelled to pay the higher price for their goods, but denied that increased rate of pension to which they are so justly entitled. Yet that is the gist of the argument made here to-day by the gentleman from Texas. The conclusion to be derived from his remarks was that because the tariff was not reduced therefore the widow of the soldier must starve.

Mr. MILLS. Oh, no! I made no such statement. My argument was that the rich as well as the poor should pay their share of the money necessary for governmental expenses.

Mr. WOLFORD. What I have stated is I think the legitimate conclusion from the argument made by the gentleman from Texas. Why is it, Mr. Chairman, this tariff argument is introduced here in opposition to the interests of our soldiers and sailors? Who is it this bill provides for? Who does it recognize? It recognizes the widows of our gallant soldiers and sailors who died in the service. It also recognizes the dependent mothers, nearer and dearer than widows. The sweetest word in the English language is that of mother; and this bill is to increase the pension of the mothers of the soldiers whose death in the service deprived them of the support upon which they depended—the mothers of those soldiers who died in battle that you and I, Mr. Chairman, might live as freemen—who died that we all here might enjoy the blessings of civil and religious liberty in all its fullness, in all its grandeur, in all its greatness! [Applause.] Now, then, shall these dependent mothers, because there is a tariff, which, as the gentleman says, makes goods higher, fail to receive enough from this Government to properly support them?

It has been argued that this will entail an expenditure of $5,000,000 a year. What is $5,000,000 to the blessings which have been showered upon sixty millions of freemen in this country? What is $5,000,000 to the gratitude which this country feels for those who in the hour of peril bore the brunt of the conflict of battle, to those who carried our flag triumphantly in a great war, to those to whom we owe our present incalculable advantages?

The reason I oppose any amendment to the pending bill is because I want it to go through just as it is, clear and clean, as it came from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. There are many amendments I desire to see made to the pension laws, but we can not expect to have them all at once.

The chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions stated one obvious fact, and that is that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has been economical. I admit it. Many times in the last Congress, when that same distinguished gentleman was chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I felt it to be my duty to oppose his measures because in my judgment they did not give enough to the soldier or to his widow, and I spoke and voted to that end.

They have been more economical, I confess, than I would have been; but they have placed upon the Calendar of the House for our consideration a reasonable and modest demand, which none can object to—one that will fill with light and peace and joy and gladness the hearts of many poor, struggling widows, and many old, poverty-stricken mothers throughout the land, who are now toiling and striving to get enough for their children to wear and to eat, or to give them a little education.

It is hard work, sir. Will any gentleman in this House say that he or any other member here could live on $12 a month? "Oh, well," they will say, "the soldier's widow must be more economical than we. They are able to stand hardship and want while the country doles out to them little by little the pitiful allowance of $8 a month."

Mr. Chairman, when this country was poor, when we were struggling with its enemies, and had but little to pay with, this pension was fixed at $8 a month. It was then the measure of the wages paid to the soldier. But, thank God, through the blessings of Heaven and the knowledge of the people in digging mines and cultivating the fields, in bringing forth the treasures from under the earth and on the earth and utilizing them, we have grown rich and mighty.

Now, there are men of large capital—and I agree with gentlemen that there ought to be a way to make men of large incomes pay a part, and I did introduce a bill to that effect, but I will not undertake to discuss it here—I say there are men of large capital and there are wealthy and prosperous enterprises throughout the land. Now we are able to pay and pay liberally. This little pittance to the soldier's widow will not be felt. I take this bill just as I find it. I am for it most heartily. It creates in the hearts of the widows of our brave soldiers a grateful spirit. They will say, "I gave to my country all that I had; I would have given more if it was necessary, but they now remember me in my old age and give me enough to eat and care for me, as a recompense for the service of my husband or the service of my son who lost his life in battle."

Mr. Chairman, I want the hearts of these pure, faithful women to be raised up in thankfulness. I want them to feel that they are not neglected in their time of want and necessity. I want them to feel grateful to their country. And what will be the effect? Why, they teach lessons of patriotism and pure love of country to their children. When her little ones gather around her, even though dressed in humble clothes, she will find it in her heart to thank God that although her husband died for the Government, that Government has not forgotten his widow and children. It will make these children feel that they have a country to live for or to die for if necessary. But if they go hungry, and I ask pardon of the committee for speaking in humble language, if they go hungry and become ragged, it follows as a necessary consequence that they will not love their country so well when they know that their country neglects them.

They will say, "It fails to give that which it has promised; it has failed to care for the aged mother or the helpless father; it does not feed and clothe me; it does not help to keep me from going ragged and hungry." I put it to the patriotism of every member of this House if we would teach our children to love their country, then we should pass this bill or some such measure. But if you would teach the children of this country to want respect and confidence in their Government, then put the pensions as low as you can. I know, sir, that there is a sort of influence, an imaginary feeling in the minds of some men that large pensions will break up the country. I deny it. I am not in favor of extravagant pensions, but the Lord alone knows, when a man has given his life for his country, what is an extravagant pension. I repeat that I am not for extravagant pensions either for the soldier or for his widow; but I am for such a pension as will make them feel that under the blessings of God their country remembers them.

And then, Mr. Chairman, when again the panoply of gory war shall be seen in the land—it has passed away now, and I hope in God forever—when danger comes, if ever, and the flag of this country is threatened and you appeal to our young men to rally to the defense of the country, whether on land or sea, the strongest appeal you can make to them will be, "This country remembered your father's services; it took care of your mother in her helplessness and poverty, and it will remember you if you die or become disabled."

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for the consideration of bills on this call having expired the committee will now rise. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] will be entitled to the floor when next this business is in order.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors, had come to no resolution thereon.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. CUTCHEON. On behalf of the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs I am instructed to submit their views on the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, in accordance with permission given by the House, now presents the views of the minority on the bill he has indicated. They will be printed with the report of the majority.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would suggest that by unanimous consent we might go on with the discussion of the bill which has been pending during the morning hour, as there seems to be nothing else pending.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. Now I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed with the consideration of the bill which has been pending in Committee of the Whole during the morning hour. I think it is a bill which is entitled to the fair consideration of the House. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of that bill.

Objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] that it is not in order at this time to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider any particular bill unless it be a revenue bill or an appropriation bill or a bill relating to public lands. But it is in order to move generally to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and then bills will be taken up in their regular order. The Chair will also state that the bill which has been under consideration this morning has not become unfinished business after the expiration of the morning hour. But it would be unfinished business and take its place in that class if still pending at the expiration of the morning hour the next time it is reached.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and business on the Private Calendar will be taken up in its regular order. The Clerk will report the first business in order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to inquire if the President's message would not be the first subject for consideration, and whether a general discussion upon any subject relating to the state of the Union would not now be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The President's message has already been distributed. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill on the Calendar.

PURCHASE IN NEW YORK FOR ARMY PURPOSES.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 671) making an appropriation for the purchase of the old Produce Exchange building and the site bounded by Whitehall, Pearl, Moore, and Water streets, New York city, for Army purposes.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. SYMES. That is the bill I desire to speak upon. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado will proceed.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. SYMES. I ask the Clerk to read as a part of my remarks the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas great uncertainty and apprehension are felt throughout the country regarding the question of suspending the coinage of silver; and

Whereas such apprehension and uncertainty are very detrimental to the business and industrial interests of the country: Therefore

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States (the Senate concurring herein), That the suspension of the coinage of silver dollars would be unwise, inexpedient, and prejudicial to the material, industrial, and commercial prosperity of this country.

Mr. SYMES. I introduced that resolution into this House on the 7th day of January, and I propose to submit some remarks upon the silver question in support of it. During the time I shall occupy the floor of the House I shall attempt to answer some of the reasons which have been advanced by monometallists in favor of the suspension of silver coinage.

SILVER WILL CIRCULATE.

It is said that silver will not circulate—that the people do not want it; and numerous schemes have been proposed to partially suspend the coinage and leave it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to coin "so much as there should be a demand for." The Presidents, Secretaries of the Treasury, and several of the bureau officers have been reporting this to the country almost continually since the passage of the Bland bill. It has been repeated and reiterated by all the leading gold organs. It has been proclaimed by the special advocates of the monometallists in speeches, addresses, and interviews upon every opportune occasion.

Mr. Chairman, how can silver dollars be put into circulation except by the Treasury Department paying them out for the expenses of the Government? How can any so-called demand of the people govern the Treasury officers regarding the kind of currency or coin they pay out each day and month to the creditors of the United States? The people can regulate this only by the statute laws passed by their Representatives in Congress. A careful examination of these statutes shows they have been continually and willfully violated by the executive officers of the Government whose duty it is to enforce them.

As an eloquent orator expressed it, "This Government is a pauper. It possesses and can obtain nothing except what it levies from the people by way of taxation." The last report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the ordinary revenues of the Government for the fiscal year 1885 were $323,690,706.38, and the ordinary expenditures for the same period were $305,830,970.54, leaving a surplus of $17,859,735.84, which shows that almost $1,000,000 per day was and is being collected from the people and paid out to the creditors of the United States.

The principal portion of this great revenue comes from custom duties and internal taxes. The receipts from customs or duties on imports during the last fiscal year were $181,471,939.34, and from internal-revenue taxes $112,498,725.54. By the act of Congress passed February 25, 1862, section 5, and Revised Statutes United States, section 3473, all duties are required to be paid in gold or silver coin or certificates. All other taxes and debts due the United States may be paid in gold or silver coin or certificates, Treasury or national-bank notes. All debts due or owing by the United States to any person or persons, except interest and principal on the public debt, may be paid, at the option of the Government, in gold or silver coin or certificates or Treasury or national-bank notes.

By the provisions of the Bland silver bill the Government purchases silver bullion, coins the silver dollars, and stores them in the Treasury vaults. No person can take silver to the Treasury and obtain silver coin for it. No person can obtain silver dollars from the Government in any way whatever except in payment of a debt due him from the United States. Then how could this so-called demand of the people for silver arise or exist at the Treasury. If any individual has a gold bar he can go to the United States mints and obtain gold coin for it; but if he has a silver bar there is no way to obtain coin for it. If the United States buys his silver bar and coins it the silver dollars are stored up in the vaults.

As above stated, the Government collects from the people and pays out to its creditors approximately $1,000,000 every day, or about $25,000,000 each month. Estimating from the Treasurer's report for the four months ending October 31, 1885, in the statement giving the monthly receipts of the custom-house at New York, we find that about 53½ per cent. of this is received in gold coin and certificates; about 14.8 per cent. in silver coin and silver certificates, 14.2 per cent. of which is in silver certificates, and the United States purchases and coins $2,000,000 a month of silver. The remaining 31.9 per cent. is received in United States notes, as will be seen from the following table, taken from page 69 of the Treasurer's report:

Month.	Total receipts.	Gold coin.	Silver coin.	Gold certificates.	Silver certificates.	United States notes.
1885.		Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
July	$11,821,000	0.7	0.2	28.8	23.6	46.6
August	12,700,500	0.6	0.3	47.4	13.5	38.2
September	12,167,000	0.7	0.3	63.4	9.8	25.8
October	10,771,000	0.8	0.2	79.8	11.3	16.8

This latter 31.9 per cent. received in United States notes for duties on imports is in direct violation of the statute (Revised Statutes, section 3473).

Mr. Chairman, suppose we admit, for the purpose of argument only, that the supersensitive ideas of the Secretary of the Treasury regarding the maintenance of the public credit and the interests of the bondholders justified him in paying all the interest on the bonds in gold. After that, what excuse is there for his not paying out the legal-tender silver dollars, which he complains are accumulating in the Treasury so fast, for a portion of the ordinary expenses of the Government? The interest on the public debt is approximately $4,000,000 a month, leaving over $20,000,000 each month to be paid out for other expenses of the Government. The largest items are civil expenses, approximately $2,000,000; pensions, $5,000,000; Army and Navy, $5,000,000; sinking fund, $4,000,000; miscellaneous expenditures, including public buildings, light-houses, collecting revenues, Indians, and other items, $4,000,000. The disbursing officers can pay out this $20,000,000 in either gold or silver coin or certificates or United States or national-bank notes, at their option, except the sinking fund, which has to be paid in coin.

The Secretary of the Treasury has said, and proclaimed in different ways, that he has been making every effort to put the silver dollars in circulation. The President has announced in the Secretary's behalf that he was so doing. Then why are not such amounts of these silver dollars paid out each month as will reduce the accumulation in the vaults? Do the poor pensioners object to receiving their $4,000,000 a month in silver dollars or certificates? Do the soldiers and sailors object to receiving their pay in silver dollars or certificates? Do the clerks in the Departments, the laborers on public buildings, or any of those classes, object? Not at all.

It is a false pretense, Mr. Chairman, for the Secretary to say he was and is making an unsuccessful attempt to put silver in circulation, when if one-fourth of the ordinary expenses of the Government had been paid in silver dollars each month there would have been no surplus of silver dollars in the Treasury. These are the facts, admitting the Secretary is justified in using only gold to pay the interest on the bonds, to pay the sinking fund, and in keeping $100,000,000 all in gold as the so-called "legal-tender reserve fund." But this cannot be justified. It is a direct violation of the statutes I have referred to, not to collect all the duties on imports in gold and silver coin or certificates, and not to apply such gold and silver alike to the payment of the interest on bonds, the sinking fund, and the redemption of the public debt.

Then for what reason is this false outcry made, that the people do not want and will not accept the silver dollars in the Treasury and that the Secretary can not put them out or keep them in circulation?

The President states in his message that "every month two millions of gold in the public Treasury are paid out for two millions or more of silver dollars, to be added to the idle mass already accumulated." The President probably has information from the Treasury officials that his Secretary has been and is continuing to pay out $2,000,000 of gold per month for silver bullion, coining the bullion into silver dollars, and piling them up and keeping them idle in the Treasury. We must presume that such is the fact; although it is a plain violation of the statutes of the United States regarding the purchase and coinage of silver bullion and the disbursing of public moneys for the ordinary expenditures of the Government. What excuse has the Secretary for not paying for this silver bullion in silver dollars? Do the silver miners who produce this bullion object to taking silver coin or certificates in payment for it? Certainly the Secretary has no excuse in this case for saying that the credit of the Government will be affected by paying for this bullion in silver. The bondholders may object to taking silver; but the silver producers do not. If the Secretary should advertise for bids for silver bullion to be paid for in silver dollars or certificates, a large number of the great silver producers of the country would sell the bullion as cheaply as if it were advertised to be paid for in gold.

These misrepresentations are made for the purpose of deceiving the people. They are made in pursuance of a great conspiracy formed by the bondholders, capitalists, and monometallists of the money centers to demonetize one-half of the metal money of the world, thereby to greatly appreciate the value of all fixed incomes and credits and depreciate all productive property and labor. It is a matter of most serious public concern that the highest executive officers of the Government are aiding this conspiracy by violating the plain letter and spirit of the statute law of the country.

Last August the Secretary of the Treasury and his assistants, the monometallists, made a great effort to get up a panic against silver by proclaiming that the gold reserve in the Treasury was fast falling below the legal limit. What the legal limit is they have never yet explained to us. The Eastern papers informed us that a great financial disaster was about to come upon the country because the silver dollars were driving all the gold out of the Treasury; that Secretary Manning had a consultation with the New York bankers and explained the impending calamity; that those bankers, in their zeal for the public good and the public credit, agreed to exchange a certain amount of gold for fractional silver coin in the Treasury to enable the Secretary to meet the immediate "so-called" gold obligations. In this way they said the financial honor of the Government and the people was preserved. These gold-bug papers all gravely suggested that the Secretary, on account of this assistance, could probably meet all his "gold obligations" until Congress should convene, and then silver coinage would be suspended.

The following statement, taken from the Treasurer's report, page 71, shows the amount of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury and of gold certificates outstanding at the end of each month from January to October, inclusive, 1885:

1885.	Total gold in Treasury, coin and bullion.	Gold certificates in Treasury, cash.	Gold certificates in circulation.	Net gold in Treasury, coin and bullion.

This report of the Treasurer shows that on the 31st of July last there was in the Treasury $126,078,595.20 in gold coin and $17,322,320 in gold certificates, being a total of net gold in the Treasury of $143,400,915.20. On the 31st of August there was net gold coin and certificates in the Treasury $143,978,157.89; on September 30 there was $155,352,564.29; on October 31 there was $173,454,439.29. The gold certificates held in the Treasury as cash are a legal tender for all so-called gold obligations the same as gold coin.

Mr. Chairman, I always deprecate the use of harsh or flippant terms in the discussion of grave and important subjects. But am I not justified in saying that all this attempt to create alarm on account of the so-called reserve in the Treasury falling below the legal wants or needs of the Government was a farce and not founded on facts? Could this attempt have had any other object than to mislead the people of this country regarding the condition of the Treasury?

At this time when this pretended effort of the Secretary and the New York bankers was being made to pile up a little more gold in the Treasury vaults, and hearalded all over the country, $50,000,0000 of gold could have been used in the redemption of bonds under the act of Congress of March 3, 1881, which provides that "the Secretary * * * may at any time apply the surplus in the Treasury to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds * * *;" and then the balance would have been entirely sufficient to meet all the so-called "gold obligations of the Government."

I use the terms "gold obligations of the Government" in deference to the monometallists and their allies, the Treasury officials, and the President of the United States. No such "gold obligations" exist against the Government. There is not a section of a statute that authorizes—there is not a bond or a contract, except the gold certificates given for gold deposited in the Treasury, that binds the Government, or by which the Government has agreed, to pay any sum in gold. They are all coin obligations; and silver as well as gold is a legal tender for all of them. Still we are continually hearing and reading of these "gold obligations of the Government," made by the President, the Treasury officials, and the monometallists, I again say for the purpose of misleading the people.

The President in his quasi-silver message to Hon. A. J. WARNER, and other members of Congress, on the 24th of February, 1885, said: "Silver and silver certificates have displaced and are now displacing gold, and the sum of gold in the Federal Treasury now available for the payment of the gold obligations of the United States and for the redemption of the United States notes called 'greenbacks' if not already encroached upon is perilously near such encroachment. These are facts which, as they do not admit of difference of opinion, call for no argument." They have been forewarned to us in the official reports of every Secretary of the Treasury from 1878 until now.

Mr. Chairman, these statements of the President regarding the so-called "gold obligations of the Government" are not so surprising to me as to many gentlemen whom I have heard criticise them. The President refers to the former reports of Secretaries of the Treasury to confirm his statement. This shows that he has been in the habit of reading and examining upon this subject only the reports of the Treasury officials and the statements of newspapers and journals in the East, all acting in concert with the gold-bugs. From these continued misstatements any intelligent gentleman, who had not made a special examination of the subject and read the statutes of the United States, would be liable to make just such erroneous declarations. If so intelligent a gentleman as the President of the United States has been misled by the continued misrepresentations which I have been referring to, published in most of the leading newspapers, read throughout the country, and proclaimed in the addresses and speeches of monometallists of high reputation as economists, what effect must such misrepresentations have upon the people.

I venture to state, from considerable investigation of this subject during the past year in the South, in the West, and in the East, that many people have announced themselves to be in favor of suspending silver coinage solely for the reason they have been entirely misled in this way; and who, if they had been familiar with the history, the legislation, and the actual facts upon the subject, would unequivocally be opposed to the suspension.

It seems to me, sir, the time has arrived when the people of this country should know whether the statutes, and the contracts made in pursuance of them, create any "gold obligations." It is time they should know whether the statutes of the United States, passed by their representatives in Congress, are to be enforced if they suit the ideas and financial views of the officials who temporarily occupy positions in the Treasury Department, or ignored and violated if they do not. It is time for the Congress of the United States to know whether the laws they pass over the veto of the President by more than two-thirds majority are to be treated as a dead letter if they come in conflict with the supposed interests of the bondholders, the monometallists, and the capitalists of the money centers.

It seems that the doctrine of nullification has been revived again. It has assumed a different form and has been practically carried out for a different purpose, but it is nevertheless as much nullification as the doctrine advocated by Calhoun and Hayne and refuted by Webster in the United States Senate in the years 1831 to 1833. That was a nullification of the laws for the collection of the revenue in the form of duties upon imports. The refutation of that nullification doctrine by Webster in the Senate and by Jackson as President has made them immortal as defenders of the Constitution and enforcers of the law. The violation of these statutes brought forth Jackson's celebrated proclamation against nullifying the statutes.

We now have to confront the nullification of the coinage and legal-tender statutes. It does not come from the South this time, but from the gold-bugs, the bondholders and the money-kings of the Eastern cities, assisted, as I have stated, by the highest executive officers of the Government. The United States, through its Treasury officials, has become a member of a clearing-house association which "boycotts" silver and refuses to receive it in settlement of balances. This is done mostly by the national banks, which receive all their franchises, privileges, and powers from the United States Government.

Daniel Webster, in his great speech on the legal currency in the House of Representatives in 1816 in support of a resolution directing the Treasury officials to collect the money due the United States in accordance with the statutes, said:

> I have had, it is true, some objections against proceeding by way of bill, because the case is not one in which the law is deficient, but one in which the execution of the law is deficient.

In the same speech he said that he wished inquiry had been made by Congress into the conduct of the Treasury officials. He said:

> I wish such inquiry had been instituted. It ought to have been; it is of dangerous consequence to permit plain omissions in executing the law to pass off, under any circumstances, without inquiry.

Again, in December, 1836, in his celebrated speech in support of the resolutions introduced for the purpose of rescinding the so-called specie circular issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, providing that certain kinds of money should be received in payment for public lands different from what the statutes had prescribed, he said:

> The statutes have declared what should be received from debtors and from purchasers, and have left no ground whatever for the interference of executive discretion or executive control. * * * From that time to this the medium for the payment of public debts and dues had been a matter of fixed legal right, and not at all a matter of executive discretion. The Secretary of the Treasury has had no more power over those laws than over other laws. He can no more change the legal mode of paying the debts than he can change the amount of the debt to be paid. He can no more alter the legal means of paying for lands than he can alter the prices of the lands themselves. It would be strange indeed if this was not so. It would be ridiculous to say that we live under a Government of laws if an executive officer may say in what currency or medium a man shall pay his taxes or debts to the Government, and he may make one rule for one man and another rule for another. We might as well admit that the Secretary had authority to remit or give in the debt to one, while he enforced payment from the other.

This language of the great defender of the Constitution and the laws is specially applicable to the Treasury officials of the executive department at this time. They have expressly violated the statutes referred to by receiving Treasury notes instead of gold and silver in payment of the duties on imports. They have expressly violated the provisions of the legal-tender laws in buying silver bullion, coining it, and piling it up in the Treasury, when the very object of the law was to have it put in circulation. They have expressly violated the sinking-fund law, and they have continually misrepresented to the public generally the letter and spirit of the law and the condition of the assets and liabilities of the public Treasury in its relation to those laws.

It seems almost unaccountable why the Congress of the United States have submitted, without inquiry or investigation, to such continued violation of the statutes. These statutes ought to be repealed or they ought to be enforced. If the financial policy of the people and of this Government is to be controlled by the Secretary of the Treasury and not by the acts of Congress it should be so understood, and the mode of selecting that official should be changed.

I desire to say as a matter of justice to the present Administration that the criticisms I make with regard to the violation of these statutes apply with about the same force to past Republican administrations. As a Republican, in justice I must say that about the same course was pursued by the Treasury officials under the late Republican administrations in the interest of monometallism, the bondholders, and the combination formed to demonetize silver as has been pursued under the present Administration. This is not a partisan question, and party lines are not drawn upon it.

It is a question between the labor interests, the great material and productive property interests, and the debtor classes on one side, and the bondholders, the capitalists, and the creditor classes on the other side.

SILVER CERTIFICATES.

Mr. Chairman, the Treasury officials and the gold monometallists, in their zeal, are not content with making war upon the silver dollars—calling them cart-wheel dollars and dishonest dollars and insisting they will not circulate—but they attack the silver certificates, which are as convenient and acceptable a currency to the people as ever existed in the country. On page 24 of the Treasurer's report he says:

The further issue of silver certificates should be discontinued as both useless and expensive. Issued to aid in the circulation of the standard silver dollar, these certificates have actually proved to be a hinderance to the carrying out of this purpose; and the circulation of this coin can not be increased to any greater extent than at present without the suppression of the issue of the certificates.

One would suppose from this strain of invective against silver certificates by this subordinate officer of the Treasury Department that it was the object of those who passed the Bland bill to keep as many silver dollars as possible in circulation in coin and as few silver certificates in circulation as possible, and that it was their intention not to encourage the issue of silver certificates. The Treasurer certainly knows this was not the intention of the authors of the Bland bill. He knows it was expected that the coined silver dollars would circulate mostly in the certificate form. He knows that very little gold circulates except in the certificate form. The statement of the percentage of the different kinds of money received for customs at New York, page 69 of his report, shows that only seven-tenths of 1 per cent. was received in gold coin for duties on imports at New York from July to October, 1885, and that 52.6 per cent. of all the gold received was in gold certificates. This shows that practically all the gold circulates in certificate form. During the same time one-fourth of 1 per cent. was received in silver coin and 14.55 per cent. in silver certificates. So most of the silver circulates in certificate form, as it was intended by the authors of the Bland bill.

The following table from the Treasurer's report, page 73, shows the amount of silver dollars coined to October 31, 1885, the amount in the Treasury, the amount of certificates held as cash, the amount of certificates in circulation, the net silver dollars in the Treasury, and the amount in circulation in coin:

*After deducting silver certificates in circulation.

This table shows that on the 31st day of October, 1885, there was in actual circulation 93,146,772 silver dollars in certificate form, $31,906,514 in silver certificates held as cash in the Treasury and $49,442,089 in circulation in coin. There was at this time in circulation, approximately, $50,000,000 in fractional silver coin, so there were about one hundred and ninety-three millions of silver in circulation in coin and certificate form, about one hundred millions of which circulate in coin. There is no such amount of gold coin in circulation among the people of this country. This one hundred millions of silver coin is in active circulation among the people. It is peculiarly the money of the people, and the silver certificates would be in more active circulation if they were not of such large denominations. They circulate upon a par with gold certificates and answer the same purpose in every way.

In the Treasurer's report, page 24, he gives a table, in which he pretends to show the actual circulation of silver dollars, and the percentage of distribution to the annual coinage and percentage of the outstanding silver dollars to the coinage, during the fiscal years from 1878 to 1885, as follows:

Year.	Annual coinage.	Total coinage.	On hand at close of year.	Net distribution during year.	Outstanding at close of year.	Distribution.	Outstanding.
						Pr. ct.	Pr. ct

This table states, and attempts to convey the idea, that only 18 per cent. of the coined silver in this country is in circulation or can be kept in circulation. It says nothing about the ninety-three millions of silver dollars which are in circulation in certificate form; but still it pretends to show to the people the amount of silver dollars actually in circulation. The Treasurer says:

It will be observed that during the past year more of these coins were returned to the Treasury than were issued; the issues amounted to $16,627,691 and the amount returned to $17,824,625.

We have shown that the amount of silver dollars or silver certificates held in the Treasury depends upon the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury. From the reports $31,906,015 of silver certificates and $49,442,089 of standard silver dollars were held as cash in the Treasury on the 31st of October last. We have shown that the Secretary of the Treasury could have paid out at pleasure these certificates and these coined dollars for a small portion of the ordinary expenses of the Government.

This table states that 165,535,854 silver dollars were in the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year. More than ninety-three millions of these silver dollars belong in the Treasury vaults and can not be paid out any more than can the one hundred and five millions in gold held in the Treasury for that amount of gold certificates actually outstanding. The last statement of the assets and liabilities of the Treasury on December 31, 1885, shows two hundred and fifty-three millions of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury, and $147,000,000 net gold in the Treasury over and above the one hundred and five millions of gold certificates outstanding. It also shows one hundred and sixty-nine millions of silver in the Treasury, being seventy-six millions over and above the ninety-three millions of outstanding silver certificates. There is stored in the Treasury only about one-half as much net silver as there is net gold.

The Secretary of the Treasury claims to have been making an extra effort to circulate silver dollars by calling in some of the one and two dollar United States Treasury notes and trying to replace this circulation with silver dollars. The Secretary knows there is a prejudice among some people against carrying from one to five dollars in silver as change. He knows much of the prejudice against silver comes from a certain class who make this objection, and ask for one and two dollar bills. It is not the object of the bimetallists or the silver men to urge or compel people to carry silver dollars if they prefer one and two dollar bills. It is their intention to give the people their choice. One and two dollar certificates should be issued and circulated with the one and two dollar United States national-bank notes. But the Secretary knew this would aid in prejudicing a certain class of people against the circulation of the silver dollars, and hence the pretended effort was made.

The day has passed in the commercial world when silver and gold coin form the circulating medium among the people, strictly speaking. Silver and gold now form the standard and legal measure of value and circulate in the form of paper money which represents them. It is a misrepresentation of the intention of the bimetallists, and those who favor silver coinage, to say they desire to force the people to carry around silver dollars in any quantity whatever. It is their desire to retain silver as one of the money metals; but they desire that it shall be used as a standard of value with gold, and circulate mostly in the certificate form, the same as gold.

I desire to correct another misrepresentation of the position of those who are opposed to the suspension of silver coinage. The Eastern papers and the gold bugs have been representing that those who favor silver coinage are in favor of silver monometallism. I claim to know the opinions of the advocates of silver coinage throughout the Southern,

Western, and Rocky Mountain country. I know they are unequivocally opposed to a single silver standard and to any financial policy that would lead to it.

SILVER COINAGE WILL NOT DRIVE GOLD OUT.

We have been told again and again, it has been repeated by all the single gold standard advocates and by all the monometallist journals throughout the country ever since the passage of the Bland bill, that the coinage of silver dollars and the issuing of silver certificates would drive all the gold out of the country. They are continuing to repeat and to proclaim this to the people of the country to-day. They have succeeded in frightening many into the position of favoring a temporary suspension of silver coinage by the continued reiteration of this. But the best estimates show that there has been a net gain of gold coin in this country of about three hundred and fifty millions since silver coinage began under the provisions of the Bland bill in 1878.

The history of gold leaving the country from about 1856 to 1876, compared with the history of the imports and exports during that period and since, is sufficient to show that it is the relative amount of imports and exports, called the balance of trade, that in a great measure keeps gold in the country or causes it to be exported. During the twenty years from 1856 to 1876 the annual production of gold in this country ranged from fifty-five to forty million dollars per annum. But, notwithstanding this immense production of gold as compared to the population, wealth, and business of the country during that period, most of the gold left us. In 1876, as shown by the report of the Director of the Mint, it was estimated that there was only $153,493,378 in gold coin in the United States. This caused many to oppose resumption because not enough gold to resume. It can not be said that the coinage of silver during these twenty years drove gold out of the country, for during this period very little silver was coined, not enough to have any appreciable effect upon the movement of gold. And although we produced in this country during these twenty years $912,650,000 in gold, yet at the end of that time the best estimates place the total amount of gold coin in the country at $153,493,378.

It will not be contended that the coining of the silver dollars and piling them up in the Treasury vaults during these twenty years drove about nine hundred millions of gold out of the country. It seems strange in the face of these facts and figures that it should have been contended, both before and since the passage of the Bland bill, that the coinage of twenty-five millions of silver dollars a year would drive, and was driving, all gold out of the country. Such experience is a superior guide to the theoretical prophecies, the fallacious reasonings, and the false assumptions of the gold-standard men, and the so-called political economists.

In the report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, pages 4 and 5, it is stated that the import of gold coin and bullion during the year was $29,064,305.45, and the export of gold coin and bullion was $8,082,142, showing an excess of imports over the exports of gold coin and bullion of $20,586,413.45.

It is a significant fact that from 1873, when silver was demonetized, to 1878, when the Bland bill passed, there was a continued excess of exports over the imports of gold coin and bullion which amounted during these five years to $127,526,036, and from the year 1878, after the passage of the Bland bill, to end of fiscal year 1885 there has been a continued increase of the imports over the exports which in the aggregate, during these seven years, amounts to about two hundred millions.

Mr. Chairman, in the face of this the different Secretaries of the Treasury in their annual reports since 1878 have given it as their opinion that if the coinage of silver at the present rate was persisted in it would soon drive gold out of the country. Secretary Sherman in 1878 recommended that he be authorized to discontinue silver coinage when the amount of silver dollars should exceed fifty millions, and that, in his opinion, this was all the silver that could be maintained in circulation on a parity with gold. In 1879 the Secretary again recommended the suspension of silver coinage, or, as he said, the inevitable result would be to exclude gold coin from circulation. In 1880 the same Secretary repeated in substance the same recommendations and statements; and every Secretary of the Treasury up to the present time has continued them and predicted the same evil results if their recommendations were not carried out. But Congress has refused to suspend silver coinage or to carry out the recommendations of these different Secretaries.

The representatives of the people have watched with unabated interest the result of the progress of silver coinage, and many of them with fear and trembling have waited to see when the gold would pass from circulation, and when it should commence to leave the country, as we have shown it continued to do up to 1878, when the Bland bill was passed. But they have seen that gold continues in circulation in certificate form; that over 50 per cent. of the receipts at the New York custom-house is in gold certificates; and a much larger percentage of gold would be received were it not for the violation of the law by the Secretary of the Treasury in receiving over 25 per cent. in United States notes in payment of customs. They have seen about fifty millions of silver dollars in active circulation among the people of the country; they have seen nearly one hundred millions of silver certificates, and more than fifty millions of fractional silver coin, making approximately two hundred millions of silver, in active circulation among the people of this country; and still the amount of gold in the country is fast increasing and the circulation of it in certificate form is fast increasing. If the Secretary of the Treasury had obeyed the spirit and letter of the statutes thirty millions of silver certificates now lying idle in the Treasury and more than fifty millions of silver dollars piled up in the vaults of the Treasury, not represented by certificates, would have been paid out for a part of the ordinary expenditures of the Government, and activity added thereby to industry, trade, and commerce.

On motion of Mr. PETTIBONE the time was extended for Mr. SYMES to conclude his remarks.

Nevertheless, at the opening of the present session of Congress the Treasury officials, the President, the leading newspapers East, the bondholders, and the monometallists, with a zeal and a perseverance worthy of a better cause, make the same recommendations and statements, proclaim the same prophecies, and urge Congress to suspend the silver coinage.

It is a somewhat doubtful problem to determine how much gold and silver can circulate on an equality of value in this country. There is much room for honest difference of opinion on this subject. But aside from theory we have some practical illustrations of the subject.

France with a population not two-thirds as large as that of the United States, and with an area and material resources insignificant when compared with those of our country, has, from the last estimates made in December, 1885, in reserves in the Bank of France $233,475,000 in gold and $217,945,000 in silver. Outside of the bank, circulating among the people in business and industry, there are six hundred and twenty millions in gold and $320,000,000 of silver, making a total of $853,475,000 in gold and $541,945,000 in silver in the country, and being a grand total coin circulation of $1,395,420,000. There is a paper-money circulation of $556,000,000, making a grand total of paper and metallic money of about $1,950,000,000. Estimating the population of France at 38,000,000, we find there is in that country a per capita circulation of $22.45 of gold, $14.26 of silver, and $14.63 of paper money—a total circulation per head of $51.34. In the United States there is a per capita circulation of about $9 of gold, $4 of silver, and a smaller circulation of paper money.

France has gained in her amount of gold over England during the past few years. England, Germany, and the Scandinavian gold-standard countries surround France, as it were, and have endeavored to force a single standard upon her.

Mr. Chairman, why does not the five hundred and forty-one millions of silver in France drive out the eight hundred and fifty-three millions of gold, according to the notorious Gresham law so much harped upon by the monometallists? Why has the industrial and commercial prosperity of France during the past ten years exceeded that of any other country? It is because she has a larger bimetallic money circulation than any other country. The large amount of silver in circulation among her people stimulates and increases her industries and commercial prosperity so much that she is enabled to increase her stores of gold from the surrounding single-standard countries.

The United States will have to continue the coinage of $25,000,000 of silver per year for about twelve years before it will have in circulation as much silver as France. Estimating our population at fifty-five millions, we would have to continue our present rate of silver coinage for more than twenty years before we would have a per capita circulation in silver as large as that of France, even if our population did not increase in the mean time. The twenty-five millions of silver coined in this country is only about 1.7 per cent. of our present circulating medium—fifteen hundred million. Our population is increasing at the rate of about 3 per cent. per annum, and the increase of our trade and commerce exceeds this.

In the face of such facts and figures, drawn from the practical monetary experience of silver and gold coinage and circulation in France and in this country, how can it be contended that the coinage of twenty-five million silver dollars per annum can cause an excess of circulation or drive gold out of the country?

France has actually gained in gold by excess of imports over exports during the last ten years $276,000,000. During the same period France has increased her silver circulation over $155,000,000. Holland has a silver circulation of $12.66 per head and a gold circulation of $10 per head. Belgium has a silver circulation of $9.22 and a gold circulation of $11.13 per head. Holland and Belgium have accumulated a much greater amount of gold and silver per head during the last ten years than any of the other nations of Europe, with the exception of France, and they are double-standard countries.

It has been well said by an able writer on this subject that—

If ever there was an opportunity for the Gresham law to show its truth or falsity it has been in France and Holland and Belgium and the other bimetallic countries during the past ten years.

They have continually increased the amount of gold and silver coin in these countries since silver was so much depreciated by being demonetized in Germany and the United States in 1873. According to this so-called Gresham law, so much cited and so flippantly referred to by every gold bug of the money centers, cheap silver should have taken the place of gold in France, Holland, Belgium, and the other states of the Latin Union, and a large portion of their gold should have passed out of these countries into the gold-standard countries of Germany and England. Instead of this France has gained not less than two hundred and seventy-five millions in gold by importations from other countries, and at the same time she has largely increased her circulation of silver coin, and the other bimetallic countries have not fallen much behind. During this same period England has gained only a little over $13,000,000 of gold by her excess of imports over exports; and the Bank of England has increased its rate of discount during the past few months to stop the flow of gold to France, and Germany has done the same.

According to the report made in December last, the Imperial Bank of Germany held only 40,125,000 in gold reserves, and at the same time it held 120,300,000 in silver; and this is the single-standard country that has made the greatest sacrifice that any country ever made, or attempted to make, in pursuance of the behests of her capitalists and her creditor and bondholding classes to demonetize silver. Germany attempted this because France was compelled to pay her about one thousand millions of gold as a war indemnity. The result is that the bimetallic circulation of France, which has quickened all her energies and advanced her industrial and commercial prosperity, has enabled her to gradually draw this gold back from Germany, while Germany is making every sacrifice she can to maintain a single gold standard; still the coin reserves of the Imperial Bank to-day consist of three times as much silver as gold.

I might illustrate further from the history of the commercial world during the past decade, and show that this Gresham law, which to a certain extent is true, has been imperfectly understood and greatly misrepresented. When it is considered in connection with the material prosperity and the balance of trade as applied to nations, it contains one element of truth, and that is, that when the balance of trade is against a country that balance has to be paid in the dearer money. Consequently, when the balance of trade is in favor of a country on account of her industrial, commercial, and material prosperity, she will receive from other countries the accumulation of the dearer money. When a nation is internationally rich, has become a creditor nation, and has great industrial and material prosperity, she will receive an accumulation of the dearer money from the other countries less rich and less prosperous.

We have not space to illustrate at this time the rules of financial and political economy which make a country so rich and prosperous that she will receive from the other nations an accumulation of the dearer money. But one unvarying principle will not be denied, as shown by the prosperity of the countries above referred to, and that is, that the greater the amount of coin per head in circulation in a country the greater will be the material prosperity of that country. It vitalizes and quickens the industries. It increases the diversified resources. It employs, keeps at work, and pays all the laborers. It causes the manufacture of the raw material into useful commodities, and carries a country along the road from a debtor to a creditor nation.

Mr. Disraeli, prime minister of England in 1873, in commenting upon the results of the demonetization of silver in Germany, said:

> But it is the greatest delusion in the world to attribute the commercial preponderance and prosperity of England to her having a gold standard. Our gold standard is not the cause of our commercial prosperity but the consequence of our commercial prosperity.

England has been enabled to maintain a gold standard because she is pre-eminently the richest nation in the world, commercially, internationally, and industrially, and because she is the greatest creditor nation.

If the United States had two-thirds the coin circulation per head that France has to-day, with the addition of a paper circulation based upon that coin, a tide of material and industrial prosperity would extend all over this country, and would soon make us one of the greatest creditor nations in the world. Our undeveloped material resources are so boundless, and the wages we expect our laboring people to receive are so much larger than those of other countries, that we need a greater circulation per head than any other people. How can we increase this circulation except by the coinage of silver when we produce only thirty millions of gold per annum, about ten millions of which is consumed in the arts and manufactures?

While attempting to show that the increase in the coin circulation, or in paper currency based on coin, will greatly stimulate our industries and material prosperity, I am no advocate of a fiat money, or of a large paper circulation insufficiently secured and not convertible into coin on demand. I advocated the return to specie payment from 1875 to 1879, and at the same time I urged the remonetization of silver to aid in that resumption. The return to specie payment and the partial remonetization of silver in 1878 did bring about an era of great material prosperity. A large insufficiently secured or a fiat paper currency may apparently give temporary prosperity, but it is of a deceitful character, because the people, under such circumstances, generally think that they are getting rich, when in fact they are getting in debt.

I would say to those who fear fiat money, or a large insufficiently secured paper circulation in this country, that they are hurrying the day when such a thing is probable, by their attempted demonetization of silver. The contraction, depression, and stagnation which the demonetization of silver would bring about will create a fiat paper money party in this country in comparison with which the Greenback party from the close of the war to 1879 was small and insignificant.

GOLD MEN ARE TO BLAME FOR DEPRECIATION OF SILVER.

The special argument made by the monometallists in favor of suspending silver coinage is the depreciation in the price of silver bullion. We all regret this depreciation. The bimetallists regret it much more than the monometallists. The advocates of silver coinage regret it much more than the bondholders. But who is to blame for it? Was it not the demonetization of silver in 1878 by the monometallists that caused the great depreciation in the price of silver? Before that time the silver dollar had a greater bullion value than the gold dollar. The foundation of value of all articles is use; and when silver suddenly ceased to be used for the purposes of coinage by two of the greatest nations in the world and was boycotted by the gold-bugs and by the monometallists in the money centers, it depreciated.

In 1852 Mr. Corwin, then Secretary of the Treasury, recommended reducing the quantity of metal in the silver dollar to 384 grains, because its bullion value was greater than that of the gold dollar. An act was passed reducing the weight of metal in all coins of less denomination than one dollar. At that time the metal in the silver dollar was worth 4.26 per cent. more than the metal in the gold dollar. The price of silver at that time had risen in consequence of the scarcity for export and use in the arts, as some said; but more correctly, as others stated, the value of the gold dollar had fallen as a result of the immense production in the newly discovered gold fields of California and Australia. From 1834 to 1873 the premium on the silver dollar ranged from .34 to 5.22 per cent. over the gold dollar. It was at 2.67 per cent. premium in 1873 when silver was demonetized.

The arguments in favor of demonetization from 1870 to 1873 were mostly based upon the fact that silver dollars were intrinsically worth so much more than gold dollars they were bought up, exported, or used in the arts, and practically kept out of circulation. This was the reason given by Mr. Knox, then Comptroller of the Currency, in his report which contained a copy of the bill for demonetizing the silver dollar drawn by Mr. Boutwell, then Secretary of the Treasury, and sent to Mr. SHERMAN, chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate in 1870. Dr. Linderman, Director of the Mint at that time, gave the same reason in support of demonetization. Mr. Hooper, a member of the Coinage Committee in the House, offered an amendment to the bill which had passed the Senate to demonetize silver, providing that the silver dollar should be retained as a subsidiary coin and its metal reduced to 384 grains. He supported his amendment by the same argument, that the bullion value of the silver dollar of 412½ grains was so much greater than its nominal value it was melted by the manufacturers of silver or exported.

Mr. Chairman, from this it seems the monometallists demonetized the silver dollar in 1873 for the reason that its bullion value was so much greater than the gold dollar that it could not be kept in circulation. After the demonetization, by reason of which silver depreciated in value, these same supporters of the single gold standard opposed remonetization for the reason that the bullion value of the silver dollar had become so much less than the gold dollar that it would not circulate or be received by the people. When they urge suspension of coinage, for this reason they seek to take advantage of their own wrong.

Many who pretend at this time to be bimetallists and who are favoring what they call temporary suspension of silver coinage are acting as inconsistently with their professed motives as those who demonetized the silver dollars because their bullion value was too great, and shortly afterward opposed their remonetization because their bullion value was too small. Gentlemen of high reputation as economists and professed advocates of bimetallism are publishing articles and addresses advocating that the sure way to permanent bimetallism is to temporarily suspend silver coinage until an international monetary conference can fix the ratio of coinage between gold and silver throughout the commercial world. They claim that the temporary suspension of silver coinage in the United States would bring about this result.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to question the motives of any gentleman. But after our experience with the international monetary conferences of 1867, 1878, and 1881, I can not understand how gentlemen can have any confidence that the great states of Europe, whose policies and interests are so opposed to those of the United States, can be expected voluntarily to remonetize silver after it has been demonetized in this country. We might as well expect an international conference on the tariff to regulate the tariff system of the commercial world in accordance with the "American system" of Henry Clay.

We are the greatest silver-producing nation. We are a great debtor nation. All our great industrial and material interests demand bimetallism for our prosperity. The nations having a single gold standard are creditor nations. Their great material interests are already developed. They are seeking an outlet for their accumulated capital. They seek to control the nations of the commercial world with this accumulated capital. They seek to invest large quantities of money in the United States and to derive large fixed incomes and revenues therefrom, which come from our labor and productive property. The interests of the moneyed classes in these countries demand that one-half the metal money of the world should be demonetized, so as greatly to appreciate the value of the other half and depreciate the value of all productive property and labor, and add to the burdens of the debtor.

Any able and ingenious politician or economist, acting in the interests of the capitalists of these nations, may certainly urge the demonetization of silver; and if the same person was acting in the interest of the great majority of the people of our country he would advocate a bimetallic currency and a full remonetization of silver. The London bankers buy $20,000,000 of our cheap silver every year and coin it into roubles and make a larger profit on it, and we make it cheap for them.

Why, then, do these advocates of the so-called temporary suspension of the coinage suppose that the politicians and statesmen of those countries will act in opposition to the interest of their own moneyed classes and in favor of the interests of this country? I give it as my opinion, and caution this House and the people, that if Congress should suspend silver coinage temporarily these same gentlemen would immediately proceed to show that it was impracticable to resume the coinage. The people have more to fear from such pretended advocates of bimetallism than from those who openly advocate monometallism.

It is such dissimulation and unfair conduct of the monometallists and their allies that have misled many well-meaning people into the belief that silver coinage ought to be temporarily suspended.

Mr. Chairman, we have been and are practically doing business upon the single gold standard basis in this country, notwithstanding the statutes create a double standard. Of my own knowledge I can state that large amounts of money are being loaned throughout the country to-day where a special contract is required that it shall be repaid in gold. The debtor gives his bond and mortgage and receives silver certificates or other paper currency; but he is compelled to enter into a special contract to repay the same at some future day in gold coin. In this way the large, increasing creditor classes are becoming more and more interested in the demonetization of silver, which would result in the further appreciation of gold. This is another reason why silver has depreciated; and this is another reason why this Congress should notify the country that silver coinage will not be suspended.

Suppose, sir, all the power of the capitalists, the creditors holding the immense bonded debt, State and national, municipal and corporation, and the leading bankers and brokers who control the money centers of this country and of Europe, aided by the officers of the Treasury Department who control the receipts and disbursements of the fiscal affairs of this Government, had combined against gold as they had against silver. They could have depreciated it as much as silver has been depreciated by the same combination and money forces. The most powerful bankers' association on the continent, the New York Clearing-House, has refused to accept silver in payment of balances, and the United States subtreasury is a member of this association. The large money-loaners tell every person who asks for a loan they can only make it on a contract to repay in gold—that silver must necessarily soon be demonetized and pass out of circulation. Most of the leading journals throughout the country continue to say silver must and will be demonetized, and gold will become the only standard and measure of value in the commercial world. If the same combined money forces had been arrayed in favor of silver the bullion value of it would equal if not exceed gold to-day, as it did before demonetization in 1873.

Mr. Chairman, the legislation of this country for the past twenty years has been so formed and shaped as to make it to the interest of those controlling these money and fiscal forces to raise the price of bonds and gold and to depreciate all other commodities. The legislation ought now to be shaped so as to make it to the interest of these same forces to raise the price of silver. A fair portion of the debts and expenditures of the Government ought, by express law, to be paid in silver dollars and certificates. The national banks ought to be compelled to keep a fair proportion of their reserves in silver and silver certificates.

Time does not permit us to give a detailed outline of this proposed legislation, the most necessary and immediate of which is to notify the people of all classes and interests that Congress will not suspend the coinage of silver.

I have, sir, little but praise for the national-bank system and banks. They form the best banking system and the best banks of issue we have ever had in this country. Compared with the old insufficiently secured stump-tailed, red dog State bank currency of ante-bellum days they are as superior as silver dollars to an irredeemable paper currency. But they were created by the Government and given valuable franchises and privileges to aid in carrying out its financial policy, and when, instead of assisting to do so, they combine to defeat the will of the people and the financial policy of the Government as expressed by the acts of Congress, they should be taught their proper place, and that their relation to the Government is one of assistance and not of dictation. It can not be expected that such a great curse to a government as a national debt shall be continued for the sole and single purpose of enabling national banks to keep up their circulation secured by the national bonds.

National-bank circulation must soon be retired because the bonds that secure it must be paid off. Why should not silver coin or bullion or certificates take the place of these gold bonds to secure the national-bank circulation? The United States bonds arose from the necessities of the war and must pass away with the debt created by that war. Silver is as stable as the mountains from whence it is mined, and it has, by the common consent of mankind, been considered as convenient as gold for use as money since the days of Genesis; and the majority of the people of the commercial world to-day prefer it to gold for coinage. It has an absolute intrinsic value, because the experience of all silver mining shows that it takes over 95 cents' worth of interest on capital invested and of animated bone and muscle to produce a dollar's worth. No people on earth know this fact so well as the prospectors and miners of the Rocky Mountains.

Let not the largest silver-producing country in the world pursue the suicidal policy of depreciating her own money and one of her greatest productions.

NOT A DISHONEST DOLLAR.

They say the silver dollar is a dishonest dollar, and that the 412½ grains of standard silver in it is worth 15 or 18 cents less than the gold dollar in the London market. One hundred silver dollars will pay just as much indebtedness as one hundred gold dollars. But aside from this it is not a dishonest or depreciated dollar when tested by the correct rule. This must be determined by comparing its value with the gold dollar when the great bulk of the indebtedness, in payment of which it is a legal tender, was contracted, and by comparing it with the value of the gold dollar with reference to the average price of the ordinary commodities which man requires to live comfortably and respectably. The fact is, the gold dollar has risen in value over 25 per cent. since 1873, and the silver dollar has not depreciated in value.

The proofs of the rise in gold are many and conclusive. One evidence of the rise in the value of gold is derived from statistics, which we have dwelt upon, showing the great decrease in the production of the mines and the great increase in the demand for current use in the arts and manufactures and for coinage. If it be true that the mines have produced much less gold, and the consumption of gold has increased, then gold must have advanced in value. The unerring law of supply and demand proves this. Another evidence of the rise in gold is derived from the testimony of the leading experts and economists of the commercial world. Economists of world-wide reputation have been pointing out the rise in gold for many years. They have also shown how the demonetization of silver must inevitably greatly advance the value of gold.

The most conclusive proof, which intelligent people can understand, is the falling off in the average price of commodities in gold or legal tender during the past ten or fifteen years. There is a paramount standard by which the relative value of every commodity can be tested, and that is by comparing the price or value of one commodity with the average price of all other commodities for a series of years. To do this thoroughly requires more space than we have at command. In the report of the Director of the Mint for the calendar year 1884, from pages 497 to 502, are tables showing the value of the principal domestic commodities exported from the United States, and the values at the time of export. They show also the prices of the principal commodities in the New York market for the calendar years 1883 and 1884, compared with the prices of the preceding year and compared with the average prices of such commodities for fifty-six years preceding 1881. They show the percentage of the average value of these commodities for the years 1883 and 1884 and their average prices for the preceding period.

These tables show that the average price or value of these commodities in 1884 was 73 per cent. of their average value in 1870. These tables are too voluminous for insertion here. They can be referred to by those interested in investigating the question. Hon. Robert J. Hughes, in his work on the American dollar, exhibits carefully compiled tables showing the fall in the price of commodities and the consequent rise in the price or value of gold for a long series of years. He has selected these tables from the ablest authors upon the subject.

The following table taken from Mr. Giffen's article in the Contemporary Review gives the actual price, according to American quotations, of about twenty leading articles and showing the price of these articles in in the London market, quoted in gold, in the years 1873, 1879, and 1885:

The London Economist confirms this showing of Mr. Giffen by investigations of its own. It exhibits a table which shows the falling off of prices in London during the last ten years. The deductions drawn from these and other sources conclusively show that there has been a falling off in the general average value and price of commodities since 1870 of from 20 to 25 per cent. This shows that silver bullion and general average prices have remained very near on the same level. The prices of silver bullion have advanced slightly in comparison with the general average prices of other commodities; but the gold dollar has actually risen in value from 20 to 25 per cent.

As Judge Hughes has said:

It is not property that has fallen, but gold that has increased in value. * * * The small class who hold the thirty-five thousand millions of bonds, a portion of the indebtedness of the commercial world, have had their property augmented to the aggregate of about $7,000,000,000 at the expense of the tax-paying and debt-owing populations of the world.

In this view of the situation of things, are the masses of the people to quarrel with the silver dollar that has remained on a par with property, or with the gold eagle that has taken a flight into the empyrean?

In 1855 and 1856 Michel Chevalier wrote a series of articles on the fall in the price or value of gold on account of the great productions of the mines of California and Australia. He wrote in behalf of the creditors, the bondholders, and those having fixed incomes. He pointed out the very great injustice that would be brought about if gold coin in Europe remained a legal tender in the same ratio with silver that it had before. He drew distressing pictures of the injustice that would be visited upon those having fixed incomes of from £100 to £1,000 in England and other money centers, if they were compelled to accept the interest and principal of these credits in gold in the same fixed ratio that had before existed. He pointed out the means by which the governments of Europe should increase the amount of gold in the coins where they were a legal tender with silver. At the time he wrote, on account of the visionary expectations regarding the continued gold output, he had some foundation for his predictions and claims. But the increase of the metallic-money circulating medium brought about such an increase in industry, manufacturing, and commercial activity throughout the world that it was soon discovered that the increase of business and population kept pace with the increase of the precious metals, and prices settled back in a few years to about their old status.

But the gold monometallists have not the foundation of Michel Chevalier. We have conclusively shown that silver has not fallen in relation to the average price of other commodities. A person holding bonds, and having a fixed income therefrom to-day, can take the bullion value of the silver dollar and purchase as many of the ordinary necessaries of life as he could with the nominal value of the gold or silver dollar before 1873, even if the silver dollars were not a legal tender and were not as valuable as gold dollars in any ordinary business transactions.

NO INCREASE OF PRODUCTION OVER CONSUMPTION.

Mr. Chairman, the monometallists urge the objection that the production of silver has become so great and the cost of production so little since 1873, and the supply so greatly in excess of the demand, that it is no longer practicable to maintain its money or legal-tender character. If founded on fact, this would be legitimate argument; but like most of their arguments, it is not founded on fact. The discovery and rapid development of the large bodies of silver ore in the so-called Bonanza mines of the Comstock lode in the years 1874, 1875, and 1876 were used with great effect in this country and Europe against remonetization. As stated in the report of the monetary commission, March 2, 1877—

Similar bodies of nearly equal extent had previously been discovered and exhausted in the Spanish-American silver lodes and in the Comstock lode without attracting universal attention or arousing universal fear that the commerce of the world was about to be deluged with a flood of silver; but in the present instance, through persistent and infectious exaggerations in respect to the extent and richness of the new ore bodies, the most visionary expectations and unwarranted fears became universally epidemic.

We all remember how the hired experts of the Bonanza kings made examinations of the Comstock ore bodies and published reports, which were spread broadcast, estimating that there were from three hundred millions to one thousand millions of dollars' worth of silver in these mines. The newspapers and the monometallists gave these imaginary facts as the cause of the depreciation of silver and a great reason why it should be demonetized. The newspapers and gold-standard men in this and other countries pursued the same course of misrepresentation, and those opposing the remonetization of silver in this country, who ought to have known better, acted in concert with the monometallists of foreign countries in their exaggerations and misrepresentations regarding the production of the Comstock and other silver mines.

These misrepresentations were not confined to the kind of metal in the Comstock mine, but it was universally stated to be all silver, and the people generally supposed from these reports that the output from these mines was all or very nearly all silver metal. The fact is that 47½ per cent. of the metal product of the Comstock mines was gold. The most correct reports show the product of all the Bonanzas during the four years they had been worked, prior to 1877, did not exceed $52,500,000 worth of metal, of which over 45 per cent. was gold, leaving the product of silver from these most wonderful bonanzas in the world about $7,000,000 per annum. The estimates of the probable future production of these mines, made and reiterated by those who were at this time strenuously opposing remonetization, will rank among the brilliant works of fiction of the nineteenth century. Hundreds and even thousands of millions were talked about in these estimates with apparently the same degree of certainty that the Statistician of the Agricultural Bureau estimates the number of bushels of wheat or corn the next crop will produce.

But the most inexplicable conclusion drawn from the product of the bonanza mines by the gold-bugs at that time was that these mines which produced approximately the same amount of gold and silver were going to disarrange the relative value of the two metals throughout the commercial world. The silver product of the State of Nevada and of the United States was also greatly exaggerated. It has been shown that the average general product of Nevada during the six years immediately preceding December, 1876, amounted to $19,000,000 per annum.

The whole silver product of the United States from 1870, when demonetization was first recommended, to 1876, was from sixteen to thirty-eight million dollars per annum. During the same period the gold product of the United States was from fifty to thirty-three million dollars per annum. The following portion of a table taken from page 483 of the Director of the Mint for the calendar year 1884 shows the production of gold and silver in the United States from 1878, the year the Bland bill passed, to the year 1884:

Year.	Gold.	Silver.	Total.
1878	$51,200,000	$45,200,000	$96,400,000
1879	38,900,000	40,800,000	79,700,000
1880	36,000,000	39,200,000	75,200,000
1881	34,700,000	43,000,000	77,700,000
1882	32,500,000	46,800,000	79,300,000
1883	30,000,000	46,200,000	76,200,000
1884	30,800,000	48,800,000	79,600,000

The increase in the production of silver in this country has not supplied the decrease in the production of gold. From this table it will be seen that the total product of gold and silver in the United States fell from $96,400,000 in 1878 to $79,600,000 in 1884—a decrease of $16,800,000. The silver product of the United States increased during this period from 1878 to 1884 only $3,600,000, and during the same time the gold product fell off $20,400,000.

Still those who urge the suspension of silver coinage continually represent that the increase in the production of silver in this country is so great that it has been the cause of the depreciation in the value of silver, and for that reason silver should be demonetized. They do not deny the falling off in the production of gold; they do not deny the great increase in the use of gold in the arts. But they do not inform us what is to supply the place of silver as money. But with that blind zeal and prejudice which is characteristic of the money-loaners, the bondholders, and the creditor classes in all ages, they seek to demonetize one-half of the money metal of the world, with the object in view of appreciating the value of the other half. The production of silver outside of the United States has been falling off for the past twenty years. The production outside of North and South America is unimportant. The best estimates place the annual production of the world outside of America at $10,000,000.

The production of Mexico and the countries in South America have been growing less. These countries from 1852 to 1868 produced about $30,000,000 per annum. From 1868 to 1875 the production was about $25,000,000 per annum, falling off of about $5,000,000 per annum, and it has been decreasing since 1875 with no probability of an increase. In 1877 and 1878 the yield of the Comstock mines decreased rapidly, and has been decreasing ever since, until it is now inconsiderable. The celebrated carbonate deposits of Leadville have partially taken the place of the Comstock lode, and, fortunately, have kept up the silver product of our country. The great exaggeration regarding the actual and probable output of the silver mines had a great effect in depreciating the price of silver; and they were all made in aid of the same combination and conspiracy to demonetize silver.

Mr. Mulhall, in his Dictionary of Statistics, gives estimates of the production and consumption of silver in the world for fifty years, from 1830 to 1880, giving the respective amounts used for coinage, manufacturing, and for exportation to the East. These estimates show that during this period the mines of the world produced 57,270 tons of silver, valued at $2,475,000,000. There was consumed 62,500 tons, valued at $2,725,000,000, or a consumption of $250,000,000 more than the production. The same authority estimates that 5,230 tons of old silver candlesticks, &c., in the temples of Europe and the East, were melted down by the world to supply the deficiency between the production of the mines and the demand for current uses.

The amount of silver in the world, coined and uncoined, is estimated to be about $6,000,000,000. There is supposed to be about the same amount of gold. The gross annual product of all the mines in the world is about $100,000,000. This amounts to an annual increase of about 1.4 per cent. to the accumulated stock on hand. There is no correct data for determining the annual loss by abrasion, fire, shipwreck, and other accidents, but it is considerable in the aggregate.

The increase in the accumulation and value of property has been, and is, immense; and the continued increase in population and in the volume of exchange, trade, and commerce is almost beyond computation. During the twenty years from 1860 to 1880 the value of property in the United States increased 214 per cent., at the rate of 10.7 per cent. per annum. The foreign commerce of this country from 1860 to 1880 amounted to 40 per cent. more than all the commerce of the United States from the Revolution to 1860. The internal commerce of this country has passed all precedent, and almost conjecture. It is estimated to be twenty times greater in amount than our foreign commerce. When we contemplate that this commerce is aided by the operation of over 100,000 miles of railroad, more than exist in all other parts of the world, and nearly all constructed during the last forty years; that it is aided by internal navigation upon thousands of miles of the greatest lakes and rivers in the world; that it is enlarged by the production of the greatest crops of cereals in the Western and Southern States the world ever saw, to be exchanged for the immense quantities of manufactured articles produced in the Middle and Eastern States, figures and statistics are set at naught and the mind staggered in its efforts to comprehend its immensity.

To carry on this great commerce and trade we imperatively need, as one of the mediums of exchange and measures of valve, the coinage of all the silver dollars our mines can produce. The amount of silver coined into money from 1875 to 1883 ranged from one hundred to one hundred and sixty-one millions per annum. This coinage among the larger States was as follows: The United States, twenty-seven millions; Mexico, twenty-five millions; India, twenty-nine millions; Spain ten millions, and the balance among other countries. The best estimates show that during the past ten years a great deal more silver has been coined in the world than all the mines have produced.

The Director of the Mint made an investigation in the United States and foreign countries for three years to form a correct estimate of the amount of silver consumed in the world for other uses than coinage. He estimated that not less than thirty-five millions per annum is used in the arts and manufactures and for chemical and medicinal preparations. Dr. Soetbeer, of Germany, made a detailed estimate, and concluded that over twenty millions per annum was used in this way.

The principal supply of silver in the future for the East including India and China, and for Russia, Austria, Egypt, and the other countries where they have the single standard of silver, and produce none; and for the double standard countries of Holland, France, Italy, and others where they also produce no silver, must come from the mines of America.

The report of the Director of the Mint shows over twenty-nine millions of silver coined, nineteen millions exported and over five millions used in the arts and manufactures in the United States in the year 1884, making a total of $53,000,000. The production of all the mines in the country amounted to forty-eight millions, showing a consumption and exportation of $5,000,000 more silver than the mines produced. Then where is this great and dangerous accumulation of silver that we hear so much about?

Dr. Soetbeer and the Director of the Mint have made careful estimates of the amount of gold used in ornamentation and in the arts and manufactures. The estimates show that over $10,000,000 worth of gold per annum is used in the United States in the arts and manufactures. The same authority states that the large addition to the metallic circulation witnessed in the last thirty years appears to have been required by the increased wealth and the greater commercial enterprise and industry, and seems to have been absorbed without materially affecting general prices. These statements were made in 1879 or 1880. That prices have fallen very much since that time is conceded. It has been estimated that there has been about as much gold used during the past few years for ornamentation and in the arts and manufactures as all the mines in the world produce. Those who advocate the suspension of silver coinage do not attempt to deny these facts, nor do they attempt to point out what is to take the place of silver as a circulating medium when it is demonetized.

Mr. Chairman, the monometallists do not attempt to answer the objections made by the silver men to a single gold standard or to a suspension of silver coinage. They do not attempt to show that gold has not risen in value in comparison with all other commodities or that silver has not fallen. Few of them admit that they are monometallists. Most of them say that they are bimetallists; but still they contend that gold and silver can not circulate together, and that silver coinage should be suspended. They do not deny that the demonetization of silver has greatly appreciated the price and value of gold and depreciated the price of silver compared with gold alone and the price of all other commodities. They do not deny that the production of gold is falling off very rapidly and that the demand for current uses has increased and is increasing both for coinage and for use in the arts and manufactures; they do not attempt to point out what is to take the place of silver if it is demonetized or the coinage suspended.

They do not propose any legislation or any remedies for the stagnation of industry and the falling off in the prices of all productive property and labor that will result from suspending silver coinage, and still they advocate suspension. They are continually finding fault with and delivering philippics against compulsory coinage of the silver dollar; but they refuse to grant the people free coinage and to put silver, where it ought to be, on an equality with gold. They do not attempt to argue or show that a double, or even an alternative, standard is not more stable and better for the country, in every way, than a single gold standard; but still they resort to every means in their power, even to the violation of the plainest laws on the statute-books, to depreciate and boycott silver and, in effect, bring about a single gold standard. [Applause.]

PURCHASE IN NEW YORK FOR ARMY PURPOSES.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I desire to explain the object and purport of Senate bill 671 which has passed the Senate and comes to this House upon the report of the House Committee on Military Affairs. The object of that bill is to buy a block in the city of New York for the use of all the Army officers and offices in the city of New York. The Government has been renting a building there and paying a very large rent since the year 1868. That building is known as "The Army Building," and for its use the Government has already paid some $373,000, when the original purchase-price at which it was offered to the Government was $375,000, as appears by the papers in the case. The lease will expire on the 1st day of May next. We are paying $25,000 per annum for the use of that building. Upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War a proposition from the Produce Exchange was accepted to purchase their building for $250,000.

From the report of the architect, which accompanies the papers on file, it appears that it will require an additional expenditure of $200,000 to make the building just what the Army needs for its purposes in New York. The location is more favorable for Army purposes than that of the present building, being more convenient to the ferry, and its purchase is recommended by all the officers who are connected with the Quartermaster's Department and by the Secretary of War. The Committee on Military Affairs have reported back the bill of the Senate with two amendments. The Senate bill provides that $450,000 shall be appropriated for the purchase of the building and for making the necessary improvements. The Committee on Millitary Affairs have proposed an amendment which will make the bill specify the amount to be paid as purchase-money and the amount which is to be expended for repairs. The amendments will make the bill appropriate $200,000 for the purchase of the building, and $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the alterations to be made therein.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin what steps have been taken to ascertain the value of this property?

Mr. BRAGG. The officers of the Quartermaster's Department in New York were directed to take steps to ascertain the value of the property, and I can assure the gentleman [Mr. REAGAN] that this property is offered at a very low figure, much lower than persons who are familiar with its value supposed it could be bought for. When the building is purchased and completed fit for Army use, the interest on the money invested, at 5 per cent., will be less than the amount that we are now paying as rent of a building which is much less convenient, much less conveniently located, and which involves a much greater expense for transportation, because the building it is proposed to purchase is near the ferry which connects the city with Governor's Island, the Army headquarters there.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I will ask the gentleman upon what predicate it is assumed it will take $200,000 to repair this building?

Mr. BRAGG. It appears from the papers in the case that, under the direction of the Secretary of War, the officers of the Quartermaster's Department took steps to ascertain what repairs would be required and what they would cost. To that end an architect was employed, and he has furnished a plan of the proposed repairs, with an estimate of the cost.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that the Clerk shall report the bill before I enter upon the few remarks that I desire to make.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] finished?

Mr. BRAGG. I have done.

The Clerk read the bill and the proposed amendments, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the sum of $450,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated for the purchase of the old Produce Exchange building and site, bounded by Whitehall, Pearl, Moore, and Water streets, New York city, for Army purposes, and for the alteration and remodeling of the building so as to make it suitable in all respects for Government use, said appropriation to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That before the expenditure of any of the appropriation hereby made, good and valid title shall be secured to the United States for the land and the improvements thereon contemplated by this act, and the consent of the Legislature of the State of New York obtained to the purchase thereof.

(1) Strike out the word "four," in the first line, and insert "two."

(2) Insert in the fourth line, after the words "Army purposes, and," the words "two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, this bill having come from the Senate after apparently careful consideration, and having been also considered by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, it is probable that I ought not to antagonize its passage; but I rise for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that when the Government has property to sell it can get but the lowest price, in fact oftentimes only a portion of its real value; but when it becomes necessary for the Government to buy property it is generally necessary for the Government to pay the very highest price for it. Now we are in danger of establishing a precedent here for boards of trade in the different cities to unload upon the Government old buildings for which they have no further use. I think we should carefully consider this bill before we establish such a precedent.

When I first came to Congress, some eight years ago, there was pending here a bill for the sale of the old post-office site at the corner of Liberty and Nassau streets, in New York city. The minimum price then fixed for that building was $250,000. The bill was antagonized by myself and other members and was defeated. In the next Congress the bill came back with some increase in the minimum price for which the property was to be sold. We antagonized the bill in that Congress for the reason that the property was in a location where real estate was constantly and rapidly increasing in value, and that this property was worth a million or a million and a half of dollars. I was supported in that assertion by Mr. Cox, of New York, and by other members from that city. The bill was defeated in that Congress. It continued to reappear until in the Congress before the last those in New York who were anxious to purchase that property, as well as others who desired the Government to dispose of it, succeeded, by fixing the minimum value upon the property at $650,000, in inducing a majority to pass the bill in both Houses. I was told one day in New York by an ex-Secretary of the Treasury whose office is within half a block of the property that it was worth $1,000,000 or $1,500,000.

That property was finally sold under the bill passed by Congress; and it brought, just as I expected it would, the minimum price fixed by Congress, $650,000. I venture the assertion now that if that property were to-day vacant, without any building whatever upon it, it could be sold for one million and a half of dollars.

That was property offered by the Government for sale; and it seemed to be the general desire of many parties in New York that the Government should part with its title for the very least possible sum. In the particular case now under consideration I will not venture to say that the sum recommended by the committee is not a fair and just price for the property offered the Government; but it strikes me that if the matter has not already been carefully inquired into we should ascertain the real value of the property before final action. I well know the location of this old building. It is in a locality where property is not growing in value. On the contrary, it is my impression that property in that vicinity is growing less valuable every year because the better class of business is going away from there.

When the bill for the sale of the old post-office site in New York city was under consideration I called attention to the fact that we were paying rent on buildings in that city for the use, I believe, of the Quartermaster's Department and for other Army and governmental purposes, and I desired to save this property at the corner of Liberty and Nassau streets for the construction of buildings upon it and the use of the Government—probably for the very purpose contemplated in the present bill. If the Government had retained the post-office property, which was every year increasing in value, it might have been used for these purposes; and when we might desire to dispose of it we could gain the increase in value which will inevitably follow.

I merely desired to call attention to these facts. I have not risen for the purpose of opposing this bill, because I know nothing about the real value of this particular property or the necessity that the Government may have for it. But I wish to emphasize the fact that when the Government desires to sell property it is forced to take a price which is generally less than its actual value; and yet when the Government seeks to purchase it seems that property-holders are anxious to unload their real estate upon the Government at far more than its just value.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the object of my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has been in referring, in connection with this bill, to the sale of the old post-office site in the city of New York; but he has made some statements which I can not allow to pass without positive and absolute contradiction.

The old post-office site, situated on Nassau street, was abandoned by the Government at the time the new post-office building in the City Hall Park was occupied. That old post-office property was free from taxation. The Government was holding in the city of New York a property upon which it was collecting rents, but upon which the city of New York levied no taxes. That was an intolerable state of affairs. The property was not wanted for any purpose that the Government had then or has now in view. But it was a very valuable piece of property. It was proposed to sell it. It was sold at public auction, after full and complete advertisement for more than sixty days, and the sale was made subject to confirmation by the Secretary of the Treasury, who confirmed it after having made the most careful examination of the value of the property and having procured the estimates of competent and reputable experts.

I myself procured estimates from leading real-estate brokers in the city of New York, among whom I may name Mr. Ludlow, now dead, than whom no man ever stood higher in his line of business in that city, and Mr. A. H. Muller, now living. Neither of these gentlemen valued that property at over $600,000. I proposed to make that the limit in the bill. Not $650,000, but $600,000 was the minimum limit imposed. The sale was made; the property brought $650,000, not the minimum amount named in the bill, but $50,000 more; and all the leading owners of real estate in New York, including Mr. Astor and men as familiar with property as he is, were present, as I was, at the sale, ready to buy at a fair price. The sale was made in open market with the fullest competition, and a building has been erected on the property at a cost of more than $1,000,000; so that the taxable property of the city has been to this extent increased.

The gentleman from Illinois, when that bill was under consideration, said: "Let us remove the army headquarters down to this building." I replied that the premises occupied for the army headquarters were hired for $17,000 a year, and that the interest on $600,000 at 3 per cent. would more than pay the rent of the army headquarters; that the site and building of the old post-office was altogether unsuitable for the army headquarters; that the Government, having originally bought the property for $200,000, could sell it at a profit of over $400,000, out of which it would be able to buy a more desirable site, one better adapted to use for army headquarters. What I then told the House has been verified; $450,000 of profit from that sale is in the Treasury, of which the sum of $250,000 is now asked to purchase a larger property, better situated for the army headquarters than the other would have been; and from the profit which the Government has realized there will still be a surplus sufficient to put the building in perfect order and make it ample for the purposes of the Government for years to come.

The present rent is $17,000 a year; and when we have expended $450,000, taking interest at 3 per cent., the current rate of interest on Government obligations, the rent will amount to $13,500, a saving of $3,500 a year. That is the result of this operation; and the result of the other operation was the United States sold a piece of real estate it did not want and made a profit on it of $450,000, which, if to-day put up for sale, would bring no more than the price at which it was sold, which was $650,000. And that the gentleman from Illinois may understand what I mean by it, as I am familiar with this kind of property and understand its value, I stake whatever reputation I have for judgment, I state explicitly, that property was sold for the largest procurable sum, and could not be resold if the building was off for what it was sold at the time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to dispute any of the statements made by the gentleman from New York. The question as to the value of real estate is always a question of mere opinion. I know this, that a former colleague of the gentleman from New York stood on this floor for two terms antagonizing the selling of that property at the price then fixed in the bill, because, as he insisted, the property was worth fully a million of dollars. I allude to the present minister to Turkey, Mr. Samuel S. Cox.

Mr. HEWITT. He was in an Oriental frame of mind at the time. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not wish to take issue with the gentleman as to the most suitable location for this property, as he is more familiar with the localities in New York than I am; but it is strange to me, Mr. Chairman, in the large city of New York, when the buildings are only about three blocks apart, one should be so suitable for army headquarters and the other should not. The old post-office site is, as I understand it, only three—at any rate not exceeding four—blocks from the old Produce Exchange building. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HEWITT. You are not; and in the most of the statements you are now making you are not correct.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I leave that to be settled by the gentleman from New York with those who live in New York and who I know entertain the same opinion as I do, and who if here would make precisely the same statements I do. The gentleman says the property was sold at the highest procurable price, but I have the opinion of men, good judges of real estate in New York, who have told me that the property was sacrificed at least for one-half of its value. I will put this statement as well as other statements against that of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HEWITT. Name your man.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I name as one the ex-Secretary of the Treasury, General Benjamin H. Bristoe. I could name other gentlemen, whose names perhaps I ought not to bring into this debate.

But I have not risen, as I have said, for the purpose of antagonizing this bill. As a representative, however, of constituents who are interested as much in the money which comes into and goes out of the Treasury as those represented by the gentleman from New York, I enter my protest against any sacrifice of the property of the Government for a less sum than its fair value or the purchase of property on unfair terms.

Now, another fact in regard to this matter. I believe if the old post-office site were put up for sale in New York and no effort made by speculators to keep bidders away from the place of sale, it would bring the price put upon it by the gentlemen I have mentioned and others I could mention in New York. I simply call attention to this fact because I believe the opposition made in this House against the passage of that bill when it was first brought in fixing the price at $250,000 saved the difference between $250,000 and $650,000 it realized.

Mr. HEWITT. Six hundred and thirty thousand dollars when the accrued taxes were deducted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I thought it was $650,000.

Mr. HEWITT. Six hundred and thirty thousand dollars was the amount. I know the exact facts.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My recollection was that it was $650,000. That is all I wish to say about the matter.

I do not complain of the gentleman, and perhaps others in New York who were anxious the Government of the United States should dispose of its property in that city in order that it should pass under the operation of the laws of the State of New York. They were anxious, no doubt, to realize a large sum in annual taxes from it to go toward defraying the expenses of the city and State. Perhaps if the building were located in my district I might have had some such motive actuating me. The gentleman himself has stated now, as he stated once before, that one reason why he desired the property to be sold was because the Government was paying no tax upon it, while the city and State of New York to-day are realizing, no doubt, quite a revenue from it.

But I did not rise to make any factious opposition to the bill. I only want to get at the facts. The representations which have been made to me are sufficient to satisfy my mind that the position I take is a correct one, notwithstanding the contradiction of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, as this is not a bill to sell the old post-office in New York, and as there has been no amendment offered to set aside the sale of the old post-office, I ask the committee to recur to the bill which is now pending to act upon the amendments of the committee, and if these amendments shall meet their judgment and the Committee of the Whole shall agree with the Committee on Military Affairs, to report the bill back as amended with a favorable recommendation to the House.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask either the gentleman from Wisconsin or the chairman of the Committee of the Whole whether there is a report on this bill from the Committee on Military Affairs; and, if so, whether it has been read?

Mr. BRAGG. There is a report.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. There being such a report, showing the importance of having this building for the use of the Government, then I would be glad to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the Senate bill No. 671, "making an appropriation for the purchase of the old Produce Exchange building and the site bounded by Whitehall, Pearl, Moore, and Water streets, New York, for Army purposes," have had the same under consideration and find that the interests of the Government require for its use such a building in New York city; that the Government has already paid for rental since 1868 $373,000 for the use of a building for the purposes to which this proposed purchase is to be put; that the annual rental now paid is $25,000; that the building desired to be purchased is much more favorably located for use than the one now occupied upon rental. The measure meets the approbation of the War Department, and the committee believe the purchase to be a measure of convenience and economy; and they recommend that the bill be passed with amendments as follows:

Strike out the word "four," where it occurs in the first line of the bill, and insert the word "two."

Insert in the fourth line, after the words "Army purposes, and," the words "two hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the committee.

The first amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the second amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in the fourth line, after the words "Army purposes and," the words two hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. HEWITT. I would like to ask a question before the vote is taken on that amendment. Is the amount reduced for the purchase of the site from $250,000 to $200,000?

Mr. BRAGG. No, $450,000 in all is appropriated by the bill, $250,000 for the purchase and $200,000 for repairs.

Mr. HEWITT. That is right.

The second amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration Senate bill No. 671, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments and recommend its passage as amended.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Let the bill be reported as it will read if amended.

The bill was read at length as amended.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin demand the previous question upon the bill or the pending amendments?

Mr. BRAGG. Upon the bill and the pending amendments.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, is in order, I move that the bill be recommitted——

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order now. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS] that the previous question has been ordered on the amendments and on ordering the bill to be read a third time, and during the operation of the previous question at that stage it is not in order to move to recommit the bill. But after the bill has been ordered to be read a third time and the question recurs on its passage it will be in order to move to recommit with or without instructions, although the previous question should be then demanded or ordered. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the second amendment.

The Clerk read as follows.

Insert in the fourth line, after the words "Army purposes," the words "two hundred thousand, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BRAGG. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I move that the bill be recommitted with instructions to ascertain and report the value of the property in question. I may say that a large number of the New York delegation are unable to come to any determination in regard to this. They know nothing about it.

Mr. BRAGG. Can I be heard for a moment on this motion?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. BRAGG. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS] that the only method we have of ascertaining the value of the property is through the Quartermaster's Department, which is charged by the Secretary of War with making an investigation and a report to him. We have no other mode of ascertaining the value of the property than the report, which is lengthy and goes very fully into all details.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS] to recommit the bill with instructions.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 98, noes 54.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for the yeas and nays. I would like to say——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object to debate.

Mr. BRAGG. I would like to say that we are liable to pay $25,000 a year for the rent of a building if you defeat the passage of this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 34 members voting therefor—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 131, not voting 81; as follows:

Mr. LORE. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names of members voting.

Mr. JAMES. I object.

The following-named members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. DIBBLE with Mr. WEST.

Mr. HILL with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. GOFF.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. SADLER with Mr. HALSELL.

Mr. WARD, of Indiana, with Mr. WHITING.

Mr. JONES, of Texas, with Mr. JACKSON.

Mr. J. M. TAYLOR with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. SCRANTON.

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. COX. I desire to state that my colleague from North Carolina, Mr. GREEN, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire the privilege of voting.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat when his name was called?

Mr. MORGAN. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain a request for unanimous consent unless the gentleman was in his seat and failed to hear his name called.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and the question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 125, noes 34.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, there is no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DUNHAM and Mr. BRAGG were appointed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest to my colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] that we have the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill.

A MEMBER. Regular order.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, a sufficient number not having voted in favor thereof.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 143, noes 25.

So the bill as amended was passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 209) for the relief of the legal representatives of John M. Robeson, deceased;

A bill (S. 241) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish;

A bill (S. 311) for the relief of James Trabue, Thomas Thatcher, Michael Callahan, and the widow of John Waters; and

A bill (S. 498) for the relief of George T. Dudley.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn—

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I am directed by the Committee on Pacific Railroads to ask that the report 1431, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, together with the views of the minority, be printed in the RECORD, as the copies on file have become exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The reports are as follows:

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 6771:

The Committee on Pacific Railroads, to whom were referred so much of the annual message of the President of the United States as relates to the Pacific railroads, and House bills Nos. 35, 516, and 3801, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

On the 1st day of July, 1862, Congress passed "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," by which lands and bonds were granted to certain railroads therein mentioned to aid in their construction. By section 6 of said act it was provided "that the grants aforesaid are made upon condition that said company shall pay said bonds at maturity, &c., and all compensation for services rendered for the Government shall be applied to the payment of said bonds and interest until the whole amount is fully paid. Said company may also pay the United States, wholly or in part, in the same or other bonds, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt against the United States, to be allowed at par; and after said road is completed, until said bonds and interest are paid, at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings of said road shall also annually be applied to the payment thereof."

The grant in lands and bonds was doubled by the act of July 2, 1864, and many other powers given the companies, among which was to place a first mortgage upon their railroads equal in amount to the subsidy in bonds given by the Government, and prior in lien to the lien heretofore held by the Government. (See section 10, act of 1864.)

They were also granted powers of consolidation, and were compelled by the twelfth section to operate all the roads and branches, as far as transportation was concerned, as a continuous route.

It is evident that when the bonds were given to aid the roads the intention was for them to provide out of their assets for the payment of the interest as it fell due, and also to provide a 5 per cent. sinking fund which would retire the principal at the end of twenty years from the completion of the roads. It was stated upon the floor of Congress, and generally believed, that the compensation then being paid out for transportation of mails and Government supplies, all of which would be carried by the roads, along the routes aided, was nearly double the interest on the subsidy bonds, and that to retain one-half of said compensation would be sufficient in the hands of the Government to meet the interest payments, leaving the 5 per cent. of net earnings to liquidate the principal and any interest left unsettled. So by the fifth section of the act of 1864 it was provided "that only one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government by said companies shall be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the Government in aid of the construction of said roads."

The words in the act of 1862 to which all compensation was to be applied were "bonds and interest;" the term here used is simply "bonds," nothing being said about interest; from which we might reasonably conclude that there was a fixed determination to have the interest paid from time to time, if it took all the compensation to do it, but a willingness to remit one-half, so far as the bonds themselves were concerned, leaving the 5 per cent. to take care of them.

Under these acts the Union Pacific, the Central Pacific, the Kansas Pacific (now consolidated with the Union Pacific), the Sioux City and Pacific, and the Central Branch of the Union Pacific have received bonds upon which the Government has paid interest from time to time, some of which has been repaid, but a large portion of which has not. The following table will exhibit the status of each June 30, 1883, which is sufficiently near to show the necessity of some action being taken by Congress to secure repayment to the Government of the large and increasing debts from these roads, if repayment is desired or expected:

This table is from the public debt statement and report of the Commissioner of Railroads, 1883, page 7.

After the bonds were received by the roads, and transportation commenced, the officers of the Treasury gave such a construction to the act of 1864 that they only retained one-half the compensation for any purpose, and the 5 per cent. of net earnings. It was found that this sum was wholly inadequate to repay the interest which the Government had to pay out semi-annually for the roads, and by an act of March 3, 1873, afterward carried into section 5260 of the Revised Statutes, Congress again directed that the Secretary of the Treasury withhold "all payments to any railroad company, and its assigns, on account of freights or transportation over their respective roads, of any kind, to the amount of payments made by the United States for interest upon bonds of the United States issued to any such company, and which shall not have been reimbursed, together with the 5 per cent. of net earnings due and unapplied as provided by law," and then provided for suit to be brought by any company for such transportation, which is practically a declaration by Congress that the whole should be retained and applied, if it can legally be done, to the payment of interest. After the passage of this act the officers of the Treasury withheld all payments from the roads on the accounts mentioned, and applied them to the payment of interest until May 7, 1878, when Congress passed what is known as the "Thurman sinking-fund act," to which act this bill is an amendment.

THURMAN ACT.

We regret to say this act has not fully met the expectations of its authors. From some cause three of the railroads which received aid in bonds from the Government were omitted. We see no reason why they should not be embraced by the law requiring a sinking fund. It but extends over them and compels them to follow that wise and conservative policy which would provide the means to meet large debts which must some day be paid. Instead of dividing all their earnings among the stockholders of the present day they should lay by something for the bondholders of the future. No harm can follow from placing them under the law, and if they grow richer the Government debt may some day be made good.

KANSAS PACIFIC.

The Kansas Pacific, according to the last published report of the Commissioner of Railroads, upon the bond-subsidized portion of the road, had a net earning of $1,217,684.92 (see pages 29 and 30, report of 1883); deducting therefrom $378,180 interest on first-morigage bonds leaves $839,504.92 to which the per cent. due the sinking fund and interest requirements apply; or, in other words, the Government will pay out for the Kansas and Pacific Railroad $378,180 annually as interest, and hold back $293,826.72, on the basis of that year's earnings. We believe, however, the future of this road will soon make it able, at the rate per cent. fixed, to meet the entire interest charge.

CENTRAL BRANCH UNION PACIFIC.

The Central Branch of the Union Pacific is operated by the Missouri Pacific system, and is about 100 miles long, running from Atchison to Waterville, Kans. A statement of its condition will be found on pages 62 to 66 inclusive, of the report of the Commissioner of Railroads for 1883. The last statement of its net earnings shows $236,193.77, from which deducting $96,000, interest on the first-mortgage bonds, leaves $140,193.77 as a surplus fund. We think 35 per cent. of this can be applied safely to the Government requirements.

SIOUX CITY AND PACIFIC.

This road has been aided with bonds to the extent of 101.77 miles. A statement of its accounts will be found on page 75 of said report, which shows an increase in net earnings last year of over 200 per cent, The net earnings on the subsidized portion of the road was $108,895.94, and as the interest on the first-mortgage bonds must be provided for before any requirement for sinking-fund purposes is taken, there will be no increase in the amount realized at present under this act. However, no reason exists why it should not apply, and as soon as the earnings reach a point where something can be realized a reduction of its liability will begin.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE POWERS OF INVESTMENT.

The low rates of interest realized on the sinking-fund investments have deterred some of the companies, in a measure, from a prompt payment of dues and compliance with the terms of the law. We refer to a statement in the report of the Commissioner, on pages 249 and 250, for the year 1883, also page 12, for a full showing of the condition of the sinking fund.

While the object in establishing the sinking fund was not to make money for these corporations, but to compel them to put aside a fund to meet debts which they were not providing for, and which could not be met if all the earnings of the roads were divided among the stockholders, yet it is to the interest of all that these funds should be made as reasonably productive as possible. The Secretary of the Treasury should not be sent into the market to deal in securities, selling and investing as opportunity for speculation and change in commercial values render such action favorable, but there should and can be a reasonable enlargement of his discretion, which may render the fund more profitable. We have made such a provision, and further provided that the companies may pay the interest itself as a sinking-fund investment if they choose, with a right to have it refunded at any time that the rights of prior creditors seem to require it.

UNPAID INTEREST ACCOUNTS.

The act of May 7, 1878, was expected to keep down the indebtedness of the roads, but it has failed to do so. The unpaid interest accounts have continued to increase from year to year, and unless the amount now required of the companies is largely increased will so continue until in 1898, when the subsidy bonds, on an average, mature. It amounts now to $102,376,312.94. This is an enormous debt, increasing at the rate of $1,000,000 a year, maturing in about fourteen years, for the payment of which no provision is being made by the companies voluntarily. They only do what the statute compels them, and this slowly and with bad grace. There seems to be a fear, possibly with some foundation, that the companies are discriminating in through freights against the subsidized roads. The receipts upon this portion of the large roads upon which the lien exists are declining, the through freights being diverted over parallel lines owned by the corporations, thus giving them the advantage over the subsidized portion in the division of profits, and enhancing their value at the expense of that portion on which the Government lien exists, which is correspondingly depreciated.

How far it may be to the interest of the owners and controllers of the Union and Central Pacific to build parallel roads, surround and cut off the trade legitimately belonging to the subsidized roads, as population increases in the West and States grow up, and thereby render these lines useful only to their systems and profitable only to them, can only be determined by their present conduct. If they are strangling them now, it is not without a purpose, and we may expect a continuation of this policy. The tendency of this is to endanger the final payment of the debt which will soon be due the Government. The policy of the Government should be to compel such substantial reductions of the debt, or of those prior in lien, as will leave the remainder in 1898 so small in comparison with the value of the franchises that self-interest will compel the corporations to adjust it in order to retain control of the road.

We therefore recommend that the 25 per cent. fixed in the fourth section of the Thurman act be increased to 35 per cent. The affairs of this portion of the Union Pacific are about as follows:

Bond-subsidized road, miles	1,038 $\frac{455}{1000}$
Bonds given	$27,236,512
Stock issued	36,762,300

On which stock dividends have been declared and paid at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, as well as upon other stocks issued to the stockholders thereof. We append a table furnished in the Commissioner's report, page 26:

It must not be forgotten that the stock issued to the original owners, many of whom and some of the largest of whom, like Dillon and the Ameses, still hold it, was issued, contrary to the requirements of the act of 1862, as dividends upon the worse than doubtful operations of the Credit Mobilier, and not paid for in cash; that upon the consolidation of the Kansas and Pacific, in 1880, Mr. Gould owned about 80 per cent. of its stock, which had been selling as low as 1¾ per cent. shortly before the consolidation, and the Denver Pacific was in about the same condition, for which stocks, almost worthless, the stock of the Union Pacific Railway was given at par, which increased the stock of the new company to fifty millions, in round numbers, which was increased to its present figure of $60,868,500 by a new issue, for some purpose not disclosed in the report of the Commissioner of Railroads. In addition to these large dividends the company has from its earnings a large surplus of over a million and a half dollars per annum.

The 1,038 miles of bond-subsidized road is the principal contributor to those profitable results. The net earnings on this portion of the road in 1883 was (see Commissioner's report, page 28), after deducting all expenses and interests to prior bondholders, $8,129,246.19; after deducting the sinking-fund and interest requirements of $2,032,311.55, would leave over $6,000,000. In this large showing of the earnings of this road (see pages 26, 27, and 28, Commissioner's report, 1883), we have taken no account of the lands. We are told by the commissioner (see report of Auditor of Railroads, 1880, page 25) that at the consolidation there had been sold about 3,300,000 acres out of 19,000,000 granted, which had realized $13,000,000. There were 16,000,000 left, which, if sold at the same rate, would nearly pay the bonded debt twice over.

The cost of the Union Pacific for building and equipping was $51,000,000 in cash. Estimating on a basis of the Oakes Ames, Davis, and Hoxie contracts (Crédit Mobilier), it was $118,682,223.96. In 1879 the Auditor of Railroad Accounts in his report says: "The cost of building and equipping a railroad like the Union Pacific main line from Council Bluffs to Ogden, with similar grades and on same route, the whole of it laid with steel rails, may be stated approximately at $32,000,000." (See report of Secretary of Interior, 1881, page 577.) It could be built for much less now; steel rails and other expenses are 50 per cent. less.

The first-mortgage bonds were over $27,000,000, the Government subsidy over $27,000,000. These funds more than built the road. The parties then issued $10,000,000 of land-grant bonds and $10,000,000 of income bonds (since replaced by the sinking-fund bonds), which they divided in addition to the $36,000,000 of stock. With this record it behooves the Government to take care of itself. The 35 per cent. will take about $2,844,237.10 from the Union Pacific per annum. The Government now pays out about $1,634,190.72.

But the company is behind in back interest not repaid $16,024,557.54; the additional requirement will about provide a fund to pay this at the time the bonds mature in 1898. The Commissioner in his late computations (Miscellaneous Document No. 44, House of Representatives) says the amount due from the Union Pacific Railway under the law as it now stands will be $57,544,181.68; this includes the Kansas Pacific. Under this act, if complied with, the debt will not exceed $33,000,000, the principal of the bonds, and we may reasonably hope for its payment at the date of maturity.

CENTRAL PACIFIC.

The bond-subsidized portion of the Central Pacific is 860.66 miles, upon which bonds have been given amounting to $27,855,680, and interest paid and not yet repaid to the amount of $19,871,007. We are glad to say this road has complied with the United States requirements, and, in addition thereto, puts aside about $1,000,000 per annum to pay its bonded debts, having a sinking fund of its own amounting to over $6,000,000.

The earnings of the subsidized portion of the road will be found on page 43 of the Commissioner's report for 1883, in which it appears that, after deducting all expenses and costs and the interest on the bonds prior in lien to the Government bonds, there was a net earning of $3,171,680.95. Thirty-five per cent. of this sum will not meet the interest yearly paid out by the Government for this road, namely, $1,671,340.80, but the large sum laid by in its own sinking-fund voluntarily, and its compliance with the requirements of the acts heretofore passed, taking into consideration the value of its land grant, amounting to over $26,000,000, lead us to believe that the debt due the Government will be adjusted at maturity. It pays its stockholders a large dividend, and has continued to do so for some years. We exhibit a table from the Commissioner's report:

Date.	Capital stock outstanding.	Annual rate of dividend.	Amount paid.
		Per cent.
One-half year ending December 31, 1877	$54,275,500	6	$2,171,020

February 1, 1883	59,275,500	6	1,778,265
Total			14,468,875

The amount of increased requirement under this act is insignificant compared with the dividends and resources of the company.

CLAIMS OF ROADS.

The accounts between the Government and the railroads are in a very unsatisfactory and uncertain condition. The complications arise principally out of the act of March 3, 1873, which has since been carried into the Revised Statutes as section 5260. The companies claim that this act was an attempted modification, without their consent, of what they claim was a charter-contract made in the act of 1864; that by said act Congress retained only the right to withhold and apply one-half the compensation earned upon the bond-subsidized portion of the roads by services to the Government; therefore they say, the officers having retained all not only on the bond-aided portion but also on the non-bond-aided road owned by them (and upon roads not embraced by the Thurman act since it took effect), they have a right to recover the same back with interest.

These claims, as stated, are about as follows:

1. One-half compensation earned on bond-subsidized roads from January 1, 1873, to June 30, 1878	$1,753,554 79
2. Total compensation earned on non-bond-subsidized roads owned, leased, or operated by subsidized companies from January 1, 1873, to June 30, 1882	1,418,110 84
3. One-half compensation earned from July 1, 1878, to June 30, 1883, on bond-subsidized roads not covered by the act of May 7, 1878, or Thurman sinking-fund act	221,572 01
Total	3,393,207 64

This is for mail transportation alone, and the data furnished does not run down to date, nor has it been practicable to obtain sufficient information to give even an approximate estimate as to the amount of compensation earned by the bond-subsidized roads for services other than mail transportation of the three several classes above set forth and for the separate periods mentioned. It is thought it will equal, if it does not exceed, the amount above allowed for mail transportation.

These claims, if allowed with interest, will be over $10,000,000, and require large deficiency appropriations to pay the same. Shall they be paid, or in some way covered into the sinking fund?

It has been held by the Court of Claims that the Government could not retain, for the purpose of paying interest, any portion of the compensation due on the non-subsidized portion of said roads, or on roads controlled, leased, or operated by the subsidized companies; further, that it could only retain one-half the compensation for that purpose on the subsidized portions of said roads. This practically declares the act of March 3, 1873, inoperative, and leaves the Government to pay the claims above set forth, unless they can be covered into a sinking fund. (16 Court of Claims, 360.) It must be noted, however, that the sinking-fund act was not under consideration in the decision referred to above.

We will not argue the right of the Government at this late day to establish a sinking fund for these corporations. This right and the constitutionality of the act of May 7, 1878, have received the sanction of every branch of the Government. Passed by the Senate, agreed to by the House, signed by the President, and declared by the Supreme Court, we can safely proceed on the road marked out. If the sinking fund can be established, the amount to be paid into it, the time when it must be paid, out of what funds belonging to the corporation not devoted to prior claims it is to be paid, the manner of its payment, are all fit subjects upon which Congress can exercise, untrammeled, its legislative discretion.

The amount now due on these claims from the Government, and which they claim has been unlawfully detained and applied to the payment of interest or sinking fund, is, if their claim be true, but part of their funds, not devoted in any way to claims having priority over those debts provided for in the sinking fund.

Congress has clearly as much power to direct that $13,000,000 be paid by these companies immediately over to the sinking fund as to direct the amount fixed by the fourth section of the act of 1878. Having directed it be paid, it has a right to retain and apply any funds due the corporations in the hands of the Government upon this payment so ordered. The dispute between the Government and the roads over these claims has stood a long time, and should be settled. In so far as they have been credited upon the interest account, there can be no better way than to transfer them to the sinking fund, where Congress had power to have passed them before, and in doing so, in order that full justice may be done, allow them interest at 3 per cent. on all sums so withheld and applied, and upon the residue the interest realized upon investments made at the respective dates each sum was collected and paid into the sinking fund. In other words, put the companies as near in statu quo as we can. Of course, claims against the Government bear no interest, and the rule is not to pay it, but these claims can and should be made an exception to that rule.

This action will necessitate a restatement of the accounts between the Government and the railroads on the subject of interest; will increase largely the unpaid interest balance, and in proportion enlarge the sinking fund.

The companies will gain the interest, the fund being made productive, which applied to the unpaid interest account only reduced the amount of a non-interest-bearing debt.

In addition to these claims the Central and Union Pacific each have claims now pending for settlement for transportation of mails, excess of charges made by them over what has been allowed by the Postmaster-General, amounting to about $4,000,000 each.

They claim the original contract in the act of 1862 gave them the right "to reasonable compensation for like service rendered for private parties," and say transportation of mails is like express matter, and claim express rates. The Government proposed, until recently, to pay them the same rate as is paid to other railroads. They have refused to accept it, and claim on this account, for past services, about $8,000,000. We cannot deal with this claim, because it is repudiated by the Government. If they succeed, however, in establishing it before the courts, it can be covered into the sinking fund by some further action of Congress.

The same reasoning which brought us to the conclusion that the thirteen millions can be covered into the sinking fund authorizes us to provide that everything due the bond-subsidized roads, either earned themselves or earned by others for them, if due from the Government, can be retained to meet the demands upon the company and secure a compliance with the sinking fund, and we have therefore so provided.

We reserve and hold nothing from other companies except what belongs to those for whom the sinking fund is made. It is merely in the nature of a garnishee process, or right of equitable set-off, which any court of equity would sustain.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. Post, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, submitted the followiug as the views of the minority, to accompany bill H. R. 6771:

"The undersigned members of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, while being equally desirous with the majority of the committee of enacting such legislation as shall best conserve the interests of the Government in providing for the ultimate payment of the indebtedness of the railroads to which the subsidy bonds of the United States have been advanced in aid of the construction thereof, are yet compelled to disagree with the conclusions of the majority, and believe that the provisions of the bill reported (H. R. 6771), while aiming to reduce the indebtedness and secure to the Government the payment of an increased percentage of the net earnings of the roads, beyond that required by the act of May 7, 1878, does not, in fact, materially better the existing status of affairs, as it is at best but a temporary makeshift, and is but postponing the period when some definite action must be taken looking toward an adjustment of the debt, which must of necessity be based upon an extension of time wherein the debt may be paid.

We believe it to be of the highest importance to devise some method whereby the Government shall be secured the certain payment of the money it has advanced to the Pacific railroads, but we think that in so doing a just regard should be had for the interests of the railroad companies together with those of the Government and the people who are so largely interested in the proper maintenance of these great commercial highways. We believe that it is opportune at this time to recall a portion of the opinion of Judge Davis in delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court in United States vs. Union Pacific Railroad (91 United States Reports, S. C. 79), in which the history of the inception of the Pacific railroads is related, and from which can be deduced the necessities which brought about the inauguration of the enterprise.

He says:

"Many of the provisions in the original act of 1862 are outside of the usual course of legislative action concerning grants to railroads, and can not be properly construed without reference to the circumstances which existed when it was passed. The war of the rebellion was in progress, and owing to complications with England the country had become alarmed for the safety of our Pacific possessions.

"The enterprise was viewed as a national undertaking for a national purpose, and the public mind was directed to the end in view rather than to the particular means for securing it. Although the road was a military necessity, there were other reasons active at the time in producing an opinion for its completion besides the protection of an exposed frontier; there was a vast unpeopled territory lying between the Missouri and Sacramento Rivers which was practically worthless without the facilities afforded by a railroad for the transportation of persons and property. With its construction the agricultural and mineral resources of this territory could be developed, settlements made where settlements were possible, and thereby the wealth and power of the United States largely increased; and there was also the pressing want, in time of peace even, of an improved and cheaper method for the transportation of the mails and of supplies for the Army and the Indians.

"It was in presence of these facts that Congress undertook to deal with the subject of this railroad. The difficulties in the way of building it were great, and by many intelligent persons considered insurmountable.

"The scheme for building a railroad two thousand miles in length, across mountains, over deserts, and through a country inhabited by Indians, jealous of intrusion upon their rights, was universally regarded at the time as a bold and hazardous undertaking. It is nothing to the purpose that the apprehended difficulties in a great measure disappeared after trial, and that the road was constructed at less cost of time and money than had been considered possible. No argument can be drawn from the wisdom that comes after the fact.

"The project for building the road was not conceived for private ends, and the prevalent opinion was that it could not be worked out by private capital alone. It was a national work, originating in national necessities, and requiring national assistance.

"The primary object of the Government was to advance its own interests, and it endeavored to engage individual co-operation as a means to an end—the securing a road which could be used for its own purposes."

We have given careful consideration to the best methods of securing to the Government the enormous debt of the Central and Union Pacific Railroad Companies, which, by general average, will mature in 1898, at which time it is estimated by the Commissioner of Railroads (Report for 1883, p. 13) there will remain due and unpaid from the Central Pacific $45,995,904, and from the Union Pacific $25,262,253.60, after crediting the company with all payments to that period.

It is manifest that the sinking fund created under the act of May 7, 1878, commonly known as the "Thurman act," has failed to effect the purposes intended, by reason of conditions which were not, and at the time of its passage could not be, anticipated. It was not then foreseen that the 6, 5, and 4 per cent. Government bonds might be called in and extended at a lower rate of interest.

The report of the Commissioner shows that on June 30, 1883, there remained in the United States Treasury, uninvested, to the credit of the Central Pacific, $844,652.13, and to that of the Union Pacific, $858,532.16, being a total of $1,703,184.29.

It also appears that there was invested in the sinking fund for the Central Pacific $1,559,363.70, and for the Union Pacific $774,165.43, being a total of $2,333,529.13, at an average premium of 20 per cent. The fund has not thus far earned an interest equal to the premiums which were paid for the investment.

The original act of 1862 and the act supplemental thereto of 1864 evidently contemplated that the transportation services for the Government would pay the current interest upon the subsidy bonds, and that 5 per cent. of the net earnings per annum, which would pay the debt in twenty years, would render its repayment abundantly secure by extending the time to thirty years, being a margin of ten years over.

At that time the expenditure by the Government for military and other transportation greatly exceeded the interest which would accrue upon the whole subsidy, but the construction of the road so changed the condition of affairs in the region traversed thereby, and so diminished the necessities of transportation, that it fell far short of the current interest, resulting in a gradually accumulating debt, which it soon became apparent could not be paid under the provisions of the original law.

The "Thurman act" was an effort to secure the payment by an increase of the percentage of net earnings which the companies respectively should pay. This act has proven to be a source of litigation between the companies and the Government and of difficult enforcement.

When these roads were first constructed they had a monopoly of all transportation by land from the Pacific coast across the mountains to meet the system of railways in the East. Since then competing roads have been constructed, which so divide the trade that notwithstanding the natural increase of business and population the net earnings of the roads have been seriously diminished, and future earnings are dependent upon conditions which can not be anticipated, and which may possibly cause net earnings to disappear. The Northern Pacific has withdrawn from these lines a large proportion of the trade of Oregon, Washington, and Montana. The Atlantic and Pacific as a central line competes directly for the trade of San Francisco, Central California, and the intervening territory.

The Southern Pacific competes directly for the trade of Southern California, and thus is withdrawn to sustain these three great competing lines a large proportion of the traffic upon which the earnings of the Central and Union Pacific Companies depend. Apart from all questions of traffic purposely diverted from the subsidized and non-subsidized roads, the necessary and natural competition between these same roads seriously impairs the earnings of both and renders the payment of this enormous debt at least doubtful under any system which depends upon the levying of a percentage of net earnings.

It is also manifest that under this effective and persistent competition an increase of the percentage, as proposed by the bill reported by the majority, would compel these roads to increase the rates upon the subsidized portions of the roads, and as a consequence reduce the traffic on through freights, as it would seek other and cheaper routes so quick to take advantage of every embarrassment which the rival companies would thus encounter, and thereby seriously impair the ability of the roads to comply with the requirements of the law.

It is equally apparent that if a compliance is had with the terms and provisions of the law whereby the amount required is paid into the sinking fund by the roads, such a result can only be obtained by an increase upon local freight and passenger rates.

In our opinion such a possibility can not be viewed without deep concern, for it would impose additional burdens upon the people of Kansas, Nebraska, Nevada, Colorado, and California, as well as upon those residing in the Territories through which the lines of road affected by the law are operated.

The policy of the reduction of rates now being pursued by some of the Pacific roads, and the evident tendency on the part of Congress to compel a reduction of rates on all of the roads, would inevitably have to be abandoned, to the serious injury of the local patrons. In view of this, it is submitted to the candid reason of the House that no scheme should be adopted the effect of which would surely be to enforce the payment of the debt at the expense of the people residing along these great thoroughfares.

Furthermore, experience has demonstrated that any scheme based upon a percentage of the net earnings must necessarily place the Government at a disadvantage, and lead to endless complication and litigation, for the very good and sufficient reason that the railroad companies are directly interested in reducing these earnings to a minimum in their settlements with the Government.

The Court of Claims and the Secretary of the Treasury, adopting the opinion of the First Comptroller (see Report Railroad Commissioner, 1883, p. 244), who held that the Government can not lawfully claim any portion of the net earnings earned upon part of the road not subsidized, put the Government at great disadvantage in dealing with the active competition which the existing roads necessarily produce.

The Union Pacific system embraces a total of 4,303.5 miles, of which only 1,436 miles are subsidized. The Central Pacific system embraces a total of 3,041.71 miles, of which only 863.98 miles are subsidized.

It thus appears that the Union Pacific leases and operates 2,867.5 miles, and the Central Pacific 2,177.73 miles, upon which the Government can not appropriate any portion of their net earnings.

The Union Pacific main line from Omaha to Ogden, 1,024 miles, is all subsidized. But of the 629 miles of the Kansas Pacific from Kansas City to Denver, 394 miles only are subsidized. The whole line, 106 miles, from Denver to Cheyenne is not subsidized. Neither is the Utah Northern, from Ogden, Utah, to Garrison, Mont., 452.54 miles, nor the Oregon Short Line, from Granger, Wyo., to Weiser, Idaho, 575.96 miles. The Union Pacific main line is paralleled its entire distance from Ogden eastward by the Denver and Rio Grande, and the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad, operated by the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company. The former makes a direct connection at Ogden, and competes for all the through business of that line.

Under these circumstances it is believed that no amount can be levied by coercive legislation upon the subsidized portions of these roads which will be at all adequate to the payment of the debt.

Especially is this true when we take into consideration the facility with which pooling arrangements may be made with competing lines, whereby freights can be diverted from the subsidized roads, and thus, by diminishing the volume of business of these roads, lessen the amount of net earnings from which alone the Government is to realize its payments.

We have taken into careful consideration the recommendation of the Commissioner of Railroads (report, 1883, p. 16) that "Congress consider the practicability of commuting the present book account indebtedness for securities having the same lien and of fixed amount and payable at fixed periods."

A bill to effect this purpose, the provisions of which are believed to be the most practical solution of this question, is herewith reported as a substitute for the bill presented by the majority of the committee (H. R. 6771).

The scope of the bill, briefly stated, is to fix a day on which the indebtedness of the companies respectively to the Government shall be ascertained upon the same principle as if the whole debt and interest were to be paid on said day, with a proper rebate of interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and deducting from such amount all payments made by the companies in money or transportation or otherwise, and extending the time at an interest of 3 per cent. The period of extension for payment of the last installment of the indebtedness is forty-six years beyond the date of maturity of the subsidy bonds, or an average extension of the whole debt of twenty-three years.

In consideration of the extension of time thus granted the companies are required to deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury bonds of redemption for the amount of the debt as ascertained, in specific sums, one bond to mature every six months, and all the earnings of the road by Government transportation upon any roads owned, leased, or operated by the company shall be applied to the payment of the current maturing bonds of redemption, and no money shall be paid by the Government for transportation or service of any kind over the aided or non-aided roads until the bond next maturing shall be fully paid.

It extends the statutory lien and security now subsisting over all roads owned or operated, or hereafter acquired, no matter where situated, by the companies, including telegraph lines, franchises, rolling-stock, and property of every kind and description, to remain as security for the bonds of redemption until all are paid, embracing over 5,000 miles of road not now held as security by the Government.

It also requires that the company accepting the provisions of this bill shall also accept the provisions of the Thurman act, voluntarily yielding all questions of the constitutionality of said act.

The plan further provides that either of said companies may prepay and discharge the debt in full at any time, and as an inducement for such prepayment an abatement of 3 per cent. per annum in interest is allowed, and the companies are authorized to mortgage their franchises and property for the purpose of raising funds to redeem these bonds of redemption, if they are able and see fit to do so. The sinking fund heretofore established in the Treasury is continued, and all money paid in liquidation of the bonds of redemption by the companies will be turned into said sinking fund, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to invest such sums in interest-bearing bonds or securities so that the Government shall derive the benefit of the accruing interest to aid in the payment of the subsidy bonds at maturity.

The railroads and telegraph lines are required at all times to be at the service of the Government at rates as low as the lowest accorded to any individual for like service. A failure for six months to pay any of the redemption bonds at maturity, under the provisions of this bill, renders all of said bonds due and payable.

In order that the companies shall partake of the benefits of the proposed plan, they must accept the same under their corporate seals on or before October 1, 1884.

The purpose of the extension proposed is to bring the semi-annual payments sufficiently within the ability of the companies to render such payments entirely certain, and it can not, in our opinion, be of any vital consequence to the Government whether the debt be paid in fifty or sixty years, so long as its ultimate payment can be certainly secured.

The necessity of this extension further appears from the fact that the first-mortgage bonds of equal amount with the subsidy bonds mature at the same time, and these bonds having under the act of 1864 priority of lien over the Government, which stands in the relation of only a second-lien creditor, must be paid before the Government can obtain anything, and such payment would so strain the resources of the companies that if no extension be given the probabilities are that the foreclosure of the first-mortgage bonds would extinguish the debt of the Government, unless it is prepared to pay for the Union Pacific, including the Kansas Pacific, $33,532,000, and for the Central Pacific $27,741,000, to cover the debt with interest of the mortgage which has priority over the Government.

In the event of the companies failing to accept the provisions of the plan of extension, the Thurman sinking-fund act remains in full force and effect as to all of the aided roads, including the three lines not hitherto embraced thereunder, with the percentage increased from 25 to 35 per cent. If the Thurman sinking-fund act remains in force by the neglect of the companies to accept the plan heretofore described, then the Secretary of the Treasury is given enlarged power in the investment of the fund.

The Attorney-General is required to look to a strict enforcement of this act.

Believing the plan of adjustment provided for in the bill herewith presented to be preferable to that presented by the majority, we offer the accompanying bill, and recommend its adoption as a substitute for the bill H. R. 6771.

LEWIS HANBACK.
ISAAC M. JORDAN.

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; to provide for a settlement of the claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of said railroads, and to secure to the United States all indebtedness of the companies therein mentioned.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain the present worth, as of the 1st day of October, 1884, of the indebtedness to the United States of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, the Western Pacific Railroad Company, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company, the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, and the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, to which subsidy bonds of the United States were advanced in aid of their construction, by adding to the principal of said bonds advanced to each company or to the companies of which such company is the successor, all sums which have been paid, or which are to be paid, by the United States, as interest thereon, from which sum, so ascertained, shall be deducted the true discount, computing the same on a basis of 3 per cent. per annum; and he shall deduct from said total so ascertained the amount of money then already in the sinking fund or reimbursed to the United States by services or otherwise by either of said companies up to and including the 30th day of September, 1884.

SEC. 2. That the several companies mentioned in the preceding section be, and they are hereby, authorized to make, issue, and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and directed to receive the same, their 120 several bonds of redemption, each bearing date the 1st day of October, A. D. 1884, to an aggregate amount equal to the balance of said indebtedness so computed and ascertained as in section 1 of this act is provided; and each of said bonds shall provide for and bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum for the time each bond has to run; and each of said bonds shall be for the equal one hundred and twentieth part of the balance of such debt and interest so ascertained. Each of said bonds shall be payable semi-annually, with interest at 3 per cent. per annum, in lawful money of the United States, the first thereof on the 1st day of April, 1885, the second on the 1st day of October, 1885, and so on on the 1st days of April and October in each year thereafter until all said bonds shall have been fully paid and discharged; and each of said bonds, respectively, when paid, shall be thereupon canceled and surrendered to said companies. Said bonds of redemption shall be received by and on behalf of the United States in provisional payment of the bonds so issued by the United States to said companies mentioned in section 1 of this act: Provided, however, That no money shall be paid to the said companies, or either of them, from the United States Treasury, for or on account of services rendered to the United States, or any Department of the Government thereof, over or upon the said railroad and telegraph line so aided by the advances of subsidy bonds, or upon any railroad or telegraph line owned, leased, or operated by said companies, until the bond next maturing shall be fully paid as herein provided; but the obligation to pay said bonds so to be executed to the United States by said companies, and the obligation of the United States to pay for services, shall be deemed otherwise independent.

SEC. 3. That the statutory lien and security created and subsisting under and by virtue of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, and the act of July 2, 1864, and the act of May 7, 1878, to secure the payment of said subsidy bonds, and the interest thereon, including and together with the whole line of the said companies, and also any railroads owned by them, wherever the same may be situated, and all their telegraph lines, rolling stock, fixtures, and property of every kind and description forming a part of the operating property of said companies, as well as that which said companies, their successors or assigns, may hereafter acquire, shall be and remain as security for the payment of the bonds of redemption herein authorized until the same are fully paid: Provided, however, That either of said companies, or their successors as aforesaid, shall be entitled at any time to prepay or anticipate the payment and discharge of said bonds of redemption so held in the United States Treasury; and to that end it shall be lawful for either of said companies, its successors or assigns, to make, issue, and dispose of, subject to said lien and security of the United States, until the same shall be extinguished, its bonds to an aggregate of the amount of said bonds of redemption which may remain then outstanding and unpaid, together with the amount of the first-mortgage bonds of said companies outstanding, to bear such rate of interest and to run for such term as may be deemed most expedient, and to secure the same by mortgages, upon their railroads, telegraph, equipment, franchises, and property; and upon such payment of all said bonds to the United States the said statutory lien and security in favor of the United States shall thereupon cease and be of no effect; but the duty of said companies to obey and perform all the requirements of law in all other respects shall continue to exist; and upon any anticipated payment of said bonds of redemption the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to abate from said bonds interest on the amount thereof, from and after the date of such payment to the maturity thereof, at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum.

SEC. 4. That all sums now in the sinking fund established in the Treasury of the United States by the provisions of section 3 of the act of May 7, 1878 (including all sums heretofore reimbursed to the United States by services or otherwise by said several railroad companies, and to the credit of said companies in the United States Treasury, uninvested), shall remain in said sinking fund, and all sums derived from time to time from the payment of the bonds of redemption, either in cash or by services rendered by the said several railroad companies, shall be turned into the said sinking fund, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to invest the said sinking fund in the first-mortgage bonds of said companies, prior in lien to the Government, or bonds or securities of the United States, in his discretion, and said sinking fund shall be held and applied as in sections 7 and 8 of said act of May 7, 1878, provided.

SEC. 5. That so long as said companies respectively shall keep the said railroads and telegraph lines in proper repair and use, and shall at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph lines, and transport mails, troops, munitions of war, and supplies of public stores upon said railroads for the Government, or any Department thereof, whenever required to do so (at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not to exceed the lowest rates paid by any private party for the same kind of service), and shall give the Government preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid, as mentioned in the sixth section of the act of July 1, 1862, and shall make punctual payment of the said bonds of redemption, no other or further sums shall be demanded or required of the company so performing said service and complying with this act; and none of the penalties or liabilities provided for in either of said acts shall be incurred by or enforced upon such said companies while such punctual payments shall continue, but all such payments, requirements, penalties, and liabilities shall be suspended and not deemed to be due, or payable, owing, or incurred, until default of some of the provisions hereof shall be made, and shall have continued for a period of three months, in which case they shall, at the option of the United States, stand revived and continue in force in the same manner and to the same extent as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 6. That the acceptance of this act shall be deemed and held to be an acceptance of the act approved May 7, 1878, entitled "An act to alter and amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-mentioned act.

SEC. 7. That a failure for six months to pay any of said redemption bonds shall be deemed, taken, and held to make all the said bonds due and payable, and all the rights and securities of the United States may be thereupon enforced.

SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect, as to each of said companies or the successors thereof, upon its acceptance by its board of directors, and under its corporate seal, signed by its president and countersigned by its secretary, being filed or deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury on or before the 1st day of October, A. D. 1884; but if such acceptance be not so filed on or before that day, said company shall take no benefit therefrom.

SEC. 9. That in the event that any of said companies shall fail to accept the foregoing provisions of this act, there shall be charged and collected from such company or companies so failing, from and after the 1st day of October, 1884, 35 per cent. of their annual net earnings, to be ascertained as provided in section 1 of the act of May 7, 1878, in lieu of the 25 per cent. provided for in said act, and to that end said act of May 7, 1878, commonly called the "Thurman sinking-fund act," and any and all amendments or modifications thereof, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company, to the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, and to the Central Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company; and said act, and all amendments or modifications thereof, shall henceforth apply to said corporations equally as to those specifically named in said act.

SEC. 10. That in the event of the non-acceptance of the provisions of this act by said companies it is further provided that section 3 of said act of May 7, 1878, is so amended as to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to invest the sinking funds of said companies in the first-mortgage bonds of said companies, or any bonds or securities of the United States, in his discretion; or he may, with the assent of the companies, apply the same to the extinguishment of the interest of the subsidy bonds, the Government to refund the same on demand at any time, if at any time it becomes necessary in order to meet any debts or obligations of the said corporations prior in lien to said interest.

SEC. 11. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to cause the provisions of this act to be enforced, and he shall take all steps needful to that end, and shall report to the President each year or oftener thereon.

SEC. 12. That this act shall be deemed and taken to be a public act to all intents and purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DIBBLE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FREDERICK, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the naturalization papers of citizens which were filed as evidence in the contested-election case of Frederick vs. Wilson in the Forty-eighth Congress without leaving copies.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Also, petition of certain citizens of Jefferson County, Kentucky, for relief—to the same committee.

Also, petition of Isaac L. Hyatt, for relief—to the same committee.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 21, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with section 248 of the Revised Statutes, reports from customs and law officers concerning an amendment of the laws regulating protests, appeals, and suits against the exaction of money as duties by collectors of customs; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of members of the Savannah (Georgia) Cotton Exchange, praying for the repeal of the present laws relating to silver coinage; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented the petition of the American Peace Society, praying for the passage of a bill to promote peace among nations and for the establishment of a tribunal for international arbitration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of 32 officers and soldiers of the Union Army, representing the regular service and the volunteer service in thirteen States, praying for the establishment of national homes for indigent maimed ex-confederate soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VEST presented the petition of J. H. Miller and several hundred other citizens of Missouri, praying for the free coinage of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of Thomas Button, of Missouri, in behalf of the ex-Union soldiers of that State, praying for certain legislation in their interest; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE presented the petition of Benjamin F. Virgin, late a private in Company B, Ninth Maine Volunteers, praying that the charge of desertion be removed from his military record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 702) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 261) to provide for the distribution of the Statutes of the United States and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to designated incorporated bodies, institutions, and associations within the several States and Territories, reported a bill (S. 1176) to provide for the distribution of public documents among the depositaries of public documents; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1055) to amend section 2148 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to trespassers on Indian lands, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 10) to amend the statute in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, so that the provisions of the same shall be extended to the port of Key West, Fla., and the provisions of the seventh section of the statute be extended to the port of Tampa, Fla., reported it without amendment.

REPORT ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. MANDERSON. There was referred to the Committee on Printing a resolution introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] providing that there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the report of the Senate Select Committee on Interstate Commerce. The 5,000 copies proposed to be printed are in addition to the 1,900 copies, the usual number, heretofore ordered by the Senate. This report will make two volumes. I have here the printed matter. It is a very proper supplement to the exceedingly valuable report of Senator Windom at a former Congress. The Committee on Printing have thought it advisable to report in favor of the printing of this work, and to amend the resolution so as to provide that 15,000 copies shall be printed; 5,000 for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives. We have made an investigation as to the cost of printing the work, and find that it will cost $992.65 a thousand, the cost of printing the 15,000 copies, two volumes each, being $14,889. We report back the resolution and favor its adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Printing will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the second line, strike out "five" and insert "fifteen;" in the last line, insert "5,000" and add "and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives;" so as to read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 15,000 additional copies of the report of the Senate Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, together with the testimony, be printed; 5,000 for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHACE introduced a bill (S. 1177) for the relief of James Calpin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1178) to amend title 60, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 1179) for the relief of Benjamin B. Landis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1180) for the relief of Alexander Moseley, executor of William D. Moseley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1181) granting an increase of pension to Margaret E. Pierce; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 1182) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house on Castle Hill, Newport, R. I.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1183) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house on Gull Rocks, Newport Harbor, R. I.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1184) granting a pension to Jane D. Mumford; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1185) to regulate the pay of clerks to commandants of navy-yards; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1186) making an appropriation for a light-house on Gould Island, Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. I introduce a bill which I ask may be twice read and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I introduce the bill by request, not having examined it and knowing nothing about its provisions.

The bill (S. 1187) to amend an act incorporating the proprietors of Prospect Hill Cemetery, approved June 13, 1860, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 1188) to exempt the property of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, D. C., from taxation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1189) for the relief of Bessie S. Gilmore; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1190) granting increase of pension to Benjamin Fisher; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1191) granting a pension to Theresa Schleyer; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1192) granting a pension to Alfred Denny; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1193) to declare forfeited certain lands in the State of Michigan granted to aid in the construction of railroads and to enforce the same by judicial proceedings; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1194) to prevent demonetizing American coin by certain persons in the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in his speech yesterday said that no parties in the Senate or outside were seeking to demonetize silver. Even now and for some time there has been a determination or conspiracy on the part of capital to demonetize silver and violate the laws and Constitution.

Some years ago national banks in New York made an attempt to demonetize by ostracising silver, but as they were the immediate creatures of the law they shrewdly calculated the hazard of that venture. Now the wedge is to be entered in a different shape. Capital is arraying itself against the laws, the almost universal sentiment and prosperity of the people—a bold, deliberate strike done with malice aforethought against the interest of the masses, the interest of labor.

Severe penalties are denounced against those who debase our coin. Why should not adequate punishment be provided for those who are seeking not only its debasement but its complete overthrow?

Capital, by its extravagant and illegal demands, is arousing the storm it professes to dread, and when it succeeds, as surely it will, in forcing a stern and active protest, it will then appeal for protection to the Government whose laws it has set at defiance.

I desired to say so much in advance in order to call the attention of the Finance Committee to the matter. I ask that the bill lie on the table so that I may call it up in a few days and make some suggestions in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1195) to provide for the final settlement of the accounts of the United States with the Mississippi and Tennessee Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARRIS. I presume the bill, from the nature of its provisions, should be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator from Tennessee if the bill refers to the military operation of the railroad?

Mr. HARRIS. It does.

Mr. LOGAN. I think then it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I will say to the Senator that such bills heretofore as the one in reference to the Georgia Railroad have been referred to the Military Committee. I presume this bill is of the same character, though I do not know.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; the matter to be investigated is the sale of rolling-stock to the railroad company, relating to the military operations to which the Senator refers. If the Committee on Military Affairs has taken jurisdiction of that subject heretofore, I suppose that would be the proper reference of this bill.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire if that is the bill which has been before the Committee on Claims once and reported upon by that committee?

Mr. HARRIS. I think the particular bill I have introduced in respect to the adjustment of the accounts of this railroad company has never been before any committee. The same general subject has been before the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, there is one railroad—I do not now remember which it was, but the Senator's colleague will know, I am quite sure—where some point of this kind came up——

Mr. JACKSON. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that it was the Mobile and Ohio Railroad.

Mr. HOAR. We were asked to make an allowance to a particular railroad, and we were satisfied that if we made the allowance prayed for it would go not to the old stockholders who had really sustained the loss at the time, it being in the nature of a bounty from the Government, but to the present stockholders, who had bought the stock without expecting any such grant from the Government, and that the persons who had suffered the loss would not be the persons who would receive the indemnity. I do not know whether this is that road or not.

Mr. HARRIS. No; this is a different road.

Mr. HOAR. Then I have nothing further to say.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state the precise question involved in the bill. This railroad company in purchasing the rolling-stock at the time it did gave personal security, and the sureties compelled the railroad company to pay the contract price. In respect to quite a large number of similar corporations, making exactly the same character of purchase and at the same valuation, from time to time Congress has given relief, has abated a proportion, a percentage of the contract price of the rolling-stock, it being admitted on all hands that it was exorbitant. This bill proposes to investigate the settlement made with this railroad company. I am indifferent as to whether the bill goes to the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN. The only reason why I made the suggestion was because the claims of the Georgia Railroad and other railroads (I do not know whether they were precisely the same as this or not, but certainly they came under the same rule) have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and reported therefrom, and I took it for granted that it was proper this bill should go there unless there was some reason why it should go to some other committee.

Mr. HARRIS. I know of no reason, except as a matter of memory. I distinctly remembered that the Committee on Claims, while I was a member of it, had had at least one such bill before it; but if the general rule has been to send such bills to the Committee on Military Affairs, let that reference be made.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no desire about it, except that bills of like character have been before the Military Committee and reported upon prior to this time. The settlement with the Georgia Railroad I remember very well was before the Military Committee for some time, and was finally reported upon.

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, and will ask the reference of the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. SEWELL. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois and also to the Senator from Tennessee that this question has been before the Railroad Committee for the past two Congresses. It has been thoroughly investigated there; they are quite familiar with the subject, and I think a reference to that committee would be much better than a reference to the Military Committee, where it would be a new subject.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon as to its being a new subject, because the subject has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL. I mean as to bringing it up now for the first time in the last two years. Certainly it has not been there for four years.

Mr. LOGAN. All the settlements made with railroads operated under the military branch of the Government have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs heretofore, and with the Georgia Railroad and others very important settlements were made through that committee. There may be some reason why this bill should be referred to some other committee; but, as I understand, the Committee on Railroads is a committee for a different purpose from an examination into the military operations of railroads as to what should be paid to them or whether anything should be paid. It seems to me that the Committee on Military Affairs is the proper committee, though I am not tenacious about it.

Mr. SEWELL. It is quite immaterial to me. I made the suggestion because I was somewhat familiar with the subject.

Mr. LOGAN. I know nothing except that where matters of this kind have been referred to a committee, unless the committee has shown an incapacity to examine them, it has been the rule that they should go to the same committee, unless there was some reason to the contrary. It looks after a committee has examined a question when it is proposed that a bill of a similar kind shall be referred to another committee that there should be some reason for it. Now if there is no reason, as the Senator says there is not, it seems to me it ought to go to the Military Committee.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not wish to raise the question of the capacity of different committees to deal with subjects of this kind. I merely made the statement that this subject-matter had been investigated by the Committee on Railroads for the past two Congresses. There is certainly no objection to the bill going to the Military Committee if, as the Senator from Illinois says, that committee settled these questions originally after the war. So I withdraw the suggestion I made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. Before the reference is made I desire to state what I think is about the exact history of this transaction. In the Forty-third Congress a bill was passed, and I think it was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, making an allowance to one railroad. Then in the Forty-fourth Congress a bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and for some time, during one or two Congresses at least, all such bills were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Then in a subsequent Congress they were referred to the Committee on Claims, the very same kind of bills, and recently the Georgia Railroad bill and some others have been taken to the Committee on Railroads. That is the exact status of this class of claims, for I have been watching them very closely. I suppose any one of the three committees would have jurisdiction so far as that is concerned, as they have all three exercised that jurisdiction. I never could see how such bills could very well go to the Committee on Railroads, but either of the other two committees would be proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs if there be no objection. There being none, that reference will be made.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 1196) to amend section 3019 of the Revised Statutes relating to drawback on duties on imported material when manufactured and exported; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLER, of New York (by request), introduced a bill (S. 1197) for the relief of William H. Young; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 1198) to disapprove chapter 49 of the acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle into the Territory of New Mexico," approved March 19, 1884; which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Territories if there be no objection.

Mr. COKE. I suggest that it go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made.

Mr. HARRISON subsequently said: I rise to call attention to the reference that was made a moment ago of the bill, as I understood the title to prohibit the spread of contagious diseases among cattle in the Territory of New Mexico. I think the reference was made to the Committee on Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference was first made, but at the request of the Senator who introduced the bill it was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the reference would be more appropriately made to the committee which has charge of the general legislation on the subject of the introduction and spread of contagious diseases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Texas the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 1199) for the relief of Silas F. Feild, one of the sureties on the bond of John G. Halliburton, deceased, late marshal of the United States in and for the eastern district of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 33) to provide for printing the annual reports of the Smithsonian Institution and of the National Museum; which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, &c., That hereafter there be printed of the annual reports of the Smithsonian Institution and of the National Museum, in two octavo volumes, annually, 16,000 extra copies; of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,000 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer an amendment to the bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union, and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln. I intended to prepare a minority report dissenting from the report of the majority of the Committee on Territories; but instead of that I offer this amendment as a substitute for the bill now pending from the Committee on Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish to offer it as a substitute or as a new bill?

Mr. BUTLER. I will offer it as a substitute, and will state that it is substantially the bill that was passed by the Senate at the last Congress. In all essential particulars it is the same bill, applying to the whole Territory instead of to a part of it, with some minor changes.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the amendment the Senator proposes constitutes an enabling act for the whole Territory.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Then it is very unlike the bill reported at the last Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. I say, with that exception it is the same bill. I stated, when I presented it, that with that exception it was the bill which passed the Senate at the last Congress. Let the amendment lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from South Carolina will lie on the table and be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MCPHERSON, it was Ordered, That the papers on the files relative to the case of Capt. Andrew W. Johnson, United States Navy, be taken therefrom and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. DOLPH, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Thomas Guineau (Senate bill 814, first session Forty-eighth Congress) be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Eugene Wells be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

VENEZUELAN AWARDS.

Mr. SEWELL. I offer a resolution and move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am not sufficiently conversant with the subject to ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish the Senate, if not incompatible with the public service, with copies of correspondence between the Secretary of State and holders of Venezuelan certificates of award, or their attorneys, since March 4, 1885, in respect to the awards of the Caracas commission, or to the distribution of the amount now standing to their credit in the Department of State, or to alleged proposals of the Venezuelan minister in Washington, or other representatives of the Venezuelan Government, to buy up the said certificates pending negotiations for a review of the said awards, or any of them, under a new convention between the United States and Venezuela.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ARKANSAS HOT SPRINGS.

Mr. BERRY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Whereas the leases heretofore made of the bath-house and hot-water privileges upon the reservation of Government lands at Hot Springs, Ark., have expired by limitation of law;

Whereas the Attorney-General of the United States has given an opinion that such leases may be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior without additional legislation:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the opinion of Congress such leases of bath-house and hot-water privileges should not be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior until proper legislation is had with reference thereto.

Mr. BERRY. I ask that the resolution lie on the table, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed if there be no objection.

CLAIMS UNDER FRENCH AND SPANISH TREATIES.

Mr. HOAR. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present adoption:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the Senate with a statement showing the character and amount of each of the claims paid under the treaties with France of April 30, 1803, and of July 4, 1831, and under the treaty with Spain of February 22, 1819, together with the names of the claimants.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to inquire of the Senator if that will not entail a very large amount of labor upon the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that it will involve a very large amount of labor. It merely covers claims under the treaties named. They were all collected and a report made on each of them at one time. I understand it will not require very considerable labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be permitted to state one fact further, I will say that this will save an immense labor to the Treasury Department and to citizens in regard to the matter of French spoliation claims. A great many persons who have had an idea that their ancestors lost money in those claims will find that the loss was under these special causes, which were paid for under the treaties enumerated. I have no doubt it will save a great deal of labor in dealing with individual inquiries.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMPILATION OF SENATE ELECTION CASES.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound for the use of the two Houses 2,500 additional copies of the Compilation of Senate Election Cases, 1789–1885.

ARMY BUILDING IN NEW YORK.

A message from the House, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 671) making an appropriation for the purchase of the old Produce Exchange building and the site bounded by Whitehall, Pearl, Moore, and Water streets, New York city, for Army purposes, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the amendments made by the House of Representatives to the bill just received be read, if there is no objection. I think the Senate will concur immediately in the amendments without a reference to a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 671) making an appropriation for the purchase of the old Produce Exchange building, and the site bounded by Whitehall, Pearl, Moore, and Water streets, New York city, for Army purposes.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendments be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the House of Representatives will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 1, strike out the word "four" before "hundred" and insert the word "two;" and in line 5, after the word "and," where it first occurs, insert the words "two hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary;" so as to read:

That the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated for the purchase of the old Produce Exchange building and site, bounded by Whitehall, Pearl, Moore, and Water streets, New York city, for Army purposes, and $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the alteration and remodeling of the building, so as to make it suitable in all respects for Government use, said appropriation to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The question is on concurring in the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

The amendments were concurred in.

ALLOWANCE OF PENSION CLAIMS.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Calendar is taken up I desire to ask unanimous consent that we may take up and dispose of Order of Business No. 14 on the Calendar, being the resolution relative to certain statements made in the last annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions. I proposed a substitute, which I presume is agreeable to those who offered amendments to the original resolution, and it will not occupy any time.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to my colleague that I desire to call up the resolution in reference to certain statements in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions and have it acted upon at this time if there be no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. Would the Senator care if it went over until Monday?

Mr. HARRISON. No, I would not. I have been intending several times to call it up, but I have waited until there was a convenient time in the order of business and until I found my colleague present at such time. If he requests it the resolution may go over until Monday.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, I will be obliged to my colleague.

SIOUX RESERVATION IN DAKOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next business in order is the Calendar under Rule VIII. The first case on the Calendar will be announced.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 52) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] has proposed amendments which will be read.

Mr. HARRISON. Before those amendments are presented there are one or two other verbal amendments which I desire to propose. In section 12, line 24, the additional proviso reads:

Provided further, That the law of descent and partition in force in the Territory of Dakota or in the State of Nebraska, as the lands may be situated, shall apply thereto after patents therefor have been executed and delivered.

I move to amend by inserting after the word "the," in line 24, the words "State or," and after the word "Territory" to strike out the words "of Dakota or in the State of Nebraska, as," and to insert the word "where;" so as to read—

That the law of descent and partition in force in the State or Territory where the lands may be situated shall apply thereto after patents therefor have been executed and delivered.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In the next section ——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to modify an amendment which has been already adopted? When the bill was before the Senate the last time an amendment was adopted to section 16, at the close of the section. It is the amendment in reference to certain railroads. It is not printed in the present bill. The amendment which was adopted reads as follows:

But the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company and the Dakota Central Railroad Company shall respectively have the right to purchase of the United States at the sum of $2.50 per acre, prior to any white person and to any corporation or association, the fee title to the two separate sections of land embraced in said agreement: Provided, The said railway companies shall have made the payment and performed the conditions to be by them under said agreement performed: And provided further, That said right of purchase shall be exercised within six months after the passage of this act.

It turns out, on examining that agreement, that there was a small tract of land purchased by each of these railway companies under the agreement, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, on the other side of the river. Therefore I propose to modify that amendment, with the consent of the Senate, by inserting after the word "agreement," and before the word "provided," what I send to the Chair. That carries out the sale in reference to these small tracts on the other side of the river.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed modification will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the eleventh line of the amendment, after the word "agreement"——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Secretary please advise us what section and what page?

Mr. DAWES. It is not in the print of the bill. It was an amendment offered and adopted when the bill was before the Senate on a former occasion. That amendment was defective in not reaching these two small tracts of land, and the amendment which I propose is to apply it, just as it was adopted, to these two tracts of land. One is 75 acres and the other is 188 acres, and it applies precisely the same provision, that the railway companies may have the fee-simple after they have paid the United States $2.50 an acre in addition to what they paid the Indians under the arrangement made with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HARRISON. After the amendment is reported I desire to say a word about it simply.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification of the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "agreement," in the eleventh line of the amendment, it is proposed to insert:

And also the former company to the 188 acres and the latter company to the 75 acres on the east side of the Missouri River likewise embraced in said agreement.

So as to read:

But the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company and the Dakota Central Railroad Company shall respectively have the right to purchase of the United States at the sum of $2.50 per acre, prior to any white person and to any corporation or association, the fee title to the two separate sections of land embraced in said agreement; and also the former company to the 188 acres and the latter company to the 75 acres on the east side of the Missouri River likewise embraced in said agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it seems to me that this provision should only grant to these railroad companies so much as is necessary or convenient for railroad uses. The grounds here were procured from the Indians at a time when this territory was a reservation, and of course it was then necessary, as there were to be shops, that ground should be taken out of the reservation for the residences of those who might live there. It was appropriate then that the company should secure these two grants. Now that the whole territory is thrown open to public settlement, I suggest to the chairman whether in his opinion this extended provision is necessary. If so, I will not make any objection.

Mr. DAWES. The two tracts of land covered by this modification of the amendment are in the case of one railroad 75 acres on the other side of the river, and in the case of the other over 100 acres. These were purchased of the Indians under an agreement entered into under the direction and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. They agreed to pay the Indians $5 an acre for this land and have paid it to the Interior Department, and it has been distributed among the Indians. They have an idea, whether sound or not, that when this bill passes they will not have the fee to the land, that they will only have the title which the Indians had, which they claim was only a possessory title. Now they are willing to pay in addition to what they have paid the Indians two and a half dollars an acre for whatever interest the United States may have in that land when this bill passes. It seems to me to be very fair, and the Indian does not suffer, because the Indian will not have an opportunity to settle on this land, and he ought not to have the general 50 cents an acre, which is provided as to the other lands, because he has already received $5 an acre for it. So I think the Indian is well taken care of, and if the title of the railroad companies is in any possible way short of a fee they are entitled to the fee, especially when they are willing to pay the additional price.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the modification proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have an amendment to present to section 1. I move at the end of that section to add:

Provided, That the said tract of land in the State of Nebraska shall be reserved by executive order only so long as it may be needed for the use and protection of the Indians receiving rations and annuities at the Pine Ridge agency.

I will explain in a very few words what the object of the amendment is. This large body of land known as the Sioux reservation, consisting of about 35,000 square miles of territory in Dakota, adjoins Nebraska on its northern boundary. Some years ago, by executive order, with a view of benefiting the condition perhaps of the Sioux Nation by preventing the establishment of liquor saloons upon this land, there was a strip of land 5 miles in width and 10 miles long taken from the State of Nebraska and added to this Sioux reservation. This bill proposes that the President of the United States shall execute to these Indians a tribal patent for all the lands described in the bill. I do not understand that it is the intention of the Committee on Indian Affairs that this tribal patent shall apply to this 10-mile strip of land in the State of Nebraska. We do not object, of course, to its being retained for the purposes for which it was originally established by executive order, although the conditions have very greatly changed by reason of the stringent liquor legislation in the State of Nebraska. It is almost impossible that there should be any liquor saloons established in this territory; but I ask that this amendment may be adopted, so that it may not be included in the tribal patent to the Sioux Nation. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs not to object to this amendment, but really to desire it.

Mr. DAWES. The amendment ought to be adopted, for this strip 10 miles long and 5 miles wide taken out of Nebraska is no part of the Sioux reservation. It is only a temporary arrangement for the protection of the Pine Ridge agency, and therefore should not be included in this operation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I also propose an amendment which meets the approval of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is simply to carry out the provisions of the treaty with the Santee Sioux Indians. In section 7, line 9, after the word "thereto," I move to insert:

In accordance with the provisions of article 6 of the treaty concluded April 29, 1868, and the agreement with said Santee Sioux approved February 28, 1877.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer an amendment to section 13, commencing at line 9. After the word "provided," in that line, I move to insert:

But if any such Indian shall fail to reside upon and improve such allotment for the space of one year from the ratification of this act, the land so allotted to him shall revert to the United States, and shall be subject to entry in all respects in conformity with the provisions of this act.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] suggests the advisability of making "one year" "two years." I will so change the amendment, and make the time two years instead of one year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. MANDERSON. It seems to me this is an important amendment to this section. It is true that, following the language where I propose to insert it, section 13 provides:

Any Indian declining, within six months after this act shall take effect, this allotment, shall be entitled to such compensation for any improvements by him made upon said land as shall seem to the Secretary of the Interior just and fair.

But it seems to me there should be a limit of time within which the Indians may avail themselves of the provisions of section 13. This is the provision:

That any Indian receiving and entitled to rations and annuities at either of the agencies mentioned in this act at the time the same shall take effect, but residing upon any portion of said great reservation not included in either of the separate reservations herein established, may, at his option, have the allotment to which he would be otherwise entitled on one of said separate reservations upon the land where such Indian may then reside, such allotment in all other respects to conform to the allotments hereinbefore provided.

It certainly seems to me there should be a reasonable limit to the time within which the Indian may select that land, and if he does not do so within——

Mr. DAWES. What is the effect of the next line?

Mr. MANDERSON. I think that simply entitles him, if he does not see fit to select an allotment, to claim compensation within six months;

but I do not see that there is any limit of time within which he is bound to make his allotment.

Mr. ALLISON. This provision applies where the Indians now have allotments on the lands that will be open to settlement, and the object of the Senator from Nebraska is to require that these Indians shall improve that allotment within two years or else take their allotments elsewhere.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, sir; and then it will be open as other land.

Mr. ALLISON. It would then come under the general provisions of this bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest, instead of that, after the words "may at his option," in line 5, to say that within a certain time after the passage of this act the party shall have the allotment on the other land. Then he will be obliged to do just what he would on the lands of the reservation. Will that meet the view of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not know but that it will; and I do not know that I grasp just the idea, or where he intends to insert the language proposed.

Mr. DAWES. The idea of the bill is to separate these Indians as far as possible in their allotments from each other all over this territory. It is provided in the bill and it is provided in the treaty that they may take up their allotments on separate reservations, but if an Indian desires, instead of going upon these reservations, to go upon any of the lands that are opened by this act, the bill provides that he may have that option. I think it is right that he should make that election within a reasonable time, and I do not see that that is in the bill. Therefore the Senator's idea, if I understand what he is at, is just what ought to be in the bill. I suggest that the Indian may have this option for six months or a year after the bill shall take effect as a law. He may at his option have the allotment to which he would be otherwise entitled on one of the separate reservations, or have that allotment upon the land where the Indian may then reside. That is, if he is resident upon the lands which fall within the part opened to the public he may have for a given time, say six months—I think that is enough—after this act takes effect, his option to remain there or to take his allotment upon the reservation.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts state where he proposes to introduce the words of limitation that he suggests? I think we are both aiming to reach the same result.

Mr. DAWES. In the fifth line of section 13, on page 13, I will move, if the Senator will allow me, an amendment, so as to read:

May at his option within one year from the time this act shall take effect——

Mr. MANDERSON. "Have the allotment," and so on.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANDERSON. I withdraw my amendment. I think that reaches the matter.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the effect of the amendment now proposed to be that any Indian may within one year, or within the time fixed, take an allotment of land upon that portion of the reservation which is now to be surrendered to the Government?

Mr. DAWES. Any Indian residing on it, any Indian who is already living there.

Mr. ALLISON. That, it seems to me, ought to be done, and I think that the provision of the Senator from Nebraska should also be inserted. Suppose an Indian now residing upon the part of the reservation to be surrendered shall choose to continue to reside there for the time being, but does not make any improvements?

Mr. DAWES. The further provision of the bill is that he may decline, within six months after the act takes effect, this allotment. Perhaps the two ought to coincide. If one is a year the other should be a year, or if one is six months the other should be six months.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. DAWES. That is the purpose of it. I think the two should be the same. Therefore, if this amendment is adopted, I will not interfere with the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then you will make "six months," in line 10, "one year?"

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir. Therefore, after the word "option," in line 5 of section 13, with the consent of the Senator from Nebraska, I offer the following amendment:

Within one year from the time this act shall take effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. Does that accomplish the object of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MANDERSON. Only in part. My own idea is that there not only should be selection or allotment, but that the Indian should go upon the land as a settler for the purpose of improving it, and if he does not do something in the direction of improvement——

Mr. DAWES. If he is residing there alone he is just like any white man residing alone on land.

Mr. MANDERSON. If I understand the object of this legislation, it is to teach him habits of industry as an agriculturist.

Mr. DAWES. In line 10 of section 13 I move to strike out "six months" and insert "one year," to correspond with the previous amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection. The question is still on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Mr. HARRISON. In this immediate connection I desire to call attention to what seems to me to be a defect in the bill. In line 9 of section 13 and following are these words:

Any Indian declining, within six months—

Or, as it has now been amended, "one year"— after this act shall take effect, this allotment, shall be entitled to such compensation for any improvements by him made upon said land as shall seem to the Secretary of the Interior just and fair.

I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to the fact that there is no provision in the bill as to who shall pay that compensation. An Indian has made some improvements upon lands not included in any of the reservations established by this bill, and he declines to take his allotment there and goes upon the reservations under the bill; the bill declares that he shall be compensated for his improvements, but it does not say who shall pay him that compensation. The Secretary of the Interior is to determine what is just and fair, but it would evidently be improper for the Government to pay it, for it will get no benefit from the improvements. It ought to be paid by the settler who under the provisions of this bill shall take up the allotment which the Indian has abandoned. As it is now he is simply left in the air without any person to look to for compensation for his improvements. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to this.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is correct that the bill makes no provision for paying that expense unless it be in the twenty-first section, and I hardly think the twenty-first section is broad enough for that purpose. Therefore it would be a fair subject for the Committee on Appropriations whenever there should be any such claim made, unless the Senate thinks it would be wise to insert it here.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator that this is not a matter of public appropriation at all. Suppose an Indian has a house on his land; he abandons his allotment and a homesteader comes in and takes it under the provisions of this bill; he gets the land for 50 cents an acre without any regard to the improvements upon it; and why should the Government pay the Indian for his improvements which the settler has the benefit of? If they are paid for, it ought to be by the person who gets the benefit of them, in addition to the 50 cents an acre.

Mr. DAWES. If anybody except the United States should pay for it, the improvements, it should be the settler who takes the lot. If the Senator's experience in those matters will lead him to suggest an amendment that will cover that case I should be very glad to have it.

Mr. HARRISON. I have hastily written one. After the word "fair," in line 13, I propose to insert:

To be paid by the person who shall afterward take up such land under the provisions of this act.

Mr. ALLISON. Looking at this provision I am doubtful of its propriety either with or without the amendment suggested by the Senator from Indiana. I do not know what progress these Sioux people have made within the last few years in building houses and opening up farms on the Sioux reservation; but I should think a very small sum at this time would pay all the damages that would result to any Indian because of his refusal to accept the provisions of this particular clause. But I think we open here a way by which some ten or fifteen years from now there will be found a good many of these people who have maintained large improvements there. It seems to me that if an Indian under the treaty of 1868 has segregated himself from his tribe and wishes to open up a farm and build a house and have the accompaniments of civilization, he ought to be permitted, if he so desires, to reside upon the particular tract that he has taken; and if he does not choose to so reside he should share the fate of the provisions of law now in existence. I do not think we ought in advance to make provision suggesting that there shall be compensation made for improvements. So I would prefer, without knowing much about it, that this whole provision should be struck out.

Mr. DAWES. I think there is a good deal in what the Senator from Iowa says about this. It must, in the nature of the case, be a very little amount that an Indian can have done in the way of improvement up to this time, but he has his choice under the bill to take the land with the improvements or to leave the land and locate himself without the improvements. Unless the other members of the committee disagree with me, I shall move to strike out the provision.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator will yield to me a moment I desire to suggest to him a further consideration. There are perhaps on the land occupied by the Pine Ridge agency about nine hundred houses built by the Indians, and some eight hundred and fifty I understand at the Rosebud agency. These houses, as a rule, are built of logs, are rough in character, but the material is all furnished by the Government of the United States free of cost to the Indian. He is not only allowed to cut timber, but the team with which he hauls it and the tools with which he shall dress it into shape are all furnished by the Government. When he comes to build his house he is furnished with doors, windows, sash, hardware, and everything that goes into the construction of the house, so that really his improvements have cost him nothing. So far as other improvements are concerned, in a visit that I made during the last summer to the Pine Ridge and Rosebud agencies, while I found that the Indians had constructed these houses, as a rule they were living in their tepees outside of them, and apparently the construction of the house was ratherfor the purpose of obtaining the chattel material that was donated with it than for the purpose of living in it; and although they were furnished by a liberal government through the agent with the material for farming, the yoke of oxen, the pair of horses, the plow, the hay-rake, and so forth, all free of cost, yet I do not think I saw on any one farm more than 15 acres under cultivation for any purpose. I do not think they are a success as farmers or that their improvements will ever be of any great value.

Mr. DAWES. I will not enter into a discussion with the Senator from Nebraska upon the actual condition of these Indians. The Senator will find great gratification, I think, as well as all of us, in comparing their actual condition, whatever it may be, with their condition ten years ago; but I think that the Senator——

Mr. TELLER rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. DAWES. I will first make this motion. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa is a wise one, and therefore I move to strike out the clause commencing with the word "any," on the ninth line, and ending with the word "fair," on the thirteenth line of section 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be reported.

The SECRETARY. After the word "provided," in line 9 of section 13, it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "fair," in line 13, as follows:

Any Indian declining within one year after this act shall take effect this allotment shall be entitled to such compensation for any improvements by him made upon said land as shall seem to the Secretary of the Interior just and fair.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if I understood the Senator from Nebraska correctly he stated that these Sioux buildings had been substantially built by the Government, because the Government had furnished all the materials. That may be true as to some, but I find in the report of 1883 of the Secretary of the Interior—and I do not think there is a mistake in it—that there were 2,519 houses built on the Sioux reservation by the Sioux Indians, who substantially furnished all the materials, unless it may have been the windows and the doors.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator from Colorado will pardon an interruption, my statement was that about nine hundred houses had been built upon the land occupied by the Pine Ridge agency, and about eight hundred and fifty upon the land occupied by the Rosebud agency. There may be outside of that in this vast extent of land known as the Sioux reservation many hundred other houses. The statement with reference to the manner in which these houses are built the Senator and myself will substantially agree about. The Indian does the work of building the house, I admit, but the material that goes into its construction, the team with which he hauls the lumber from the cañon to the place where he is to build his house, are furnished to him by the Goverment and are paid for by the Government.

Mr. TELLER. I think very likely that the statement made is correct in the main, but in 1883 it became necessary to determine what was due from the Government of the United States to the confederated Sioux.

As I was about to say, we located these Sioux on this great reservation in 1868. The Sioux Nation formerly occupied pretty nearly all the northwest country, including Colorado, Nebraska, Dakota, Wyoming, and Montana to some extent. We located them on an area about as large as the State of Indiana. We entered into a contract with these Indians that if they did certain things the Government would do certain other things. We first made an agreement with them; we then ratified that agreement by statute; and one of the things that we agreed to do was that whenever an Indian should go out and locate upon a piece of land the Government would build him a house. That is in the contract. We agreed further, that whenever he did that the Government would furnish him a good American cow and a good yoke of oxen. Two thousand five hundred and nineteen of these Indians complied on their part with that statute. They built their houses. Whether they built them with the aid of the Government or whether they built them alone the houses were built. The Government avoided expense except in a very small sum, and the estimate made by the Interior Department was that the Government owed to each of these Indian families not less than $500 to pay them for building the house as they were required by the treaty. Not a single cow has ever been furnished these Sioux, not a single yoke of oxen, in accordance with that treaty, that I am aware of.

A Senator near me asks why not? That is a question very much easier asked than answered. Every Secretary of the Interior and every Commissioner of Indian Affairs since that bill passed has besought this body and the other for the appropriation of sufficient money to carry out in good faith the treaty of 1868.

I have no doubt it is exactly true, as the Senator from Nebraska says, that they have not more than 15 acres as the largest farm that they have cultivated. I only wonder myself that they have any. I wonder that these Indians in that country have even an acre, when the Government has so studiously and continuously declined to fulfill its part of the contract.

We are about to make another contract with them. We are about to buy the rest of their land, amounting, as I understand, to some ten or eleven million acres, for which we are to pay them 50 cents an acre. Mr. President, it is not at all necessary to the welfare of these Indians that we should pay them a dollar. If the Government will carry out the contract that it has made with them in good faith these Indians will be the richest community in this country. They will have cattle and they will have farms and they will have houses, and they will have their support for a good many years yet. Under the treaty we agreed, among other things, that for every thirty school children we would establish a school—an exceedingly foolish contract, I will admit. We have not furnished one school for thirty children.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to advise the Senator that the Senate is operating under the five-minute rule. The Senator has already exceeded that time.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator be allowed to proceed.

Mr. TELLER. I have no disposition to infringe the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the rule will be waived. It is the duty of the Chair to remind Senators of the expiration of their time.

Mr. TELLER. I was not aware we were considering anything under the five-minute rule. I have no desire to detain the Senate beyond a few moments on this question.

We made a contract with these Indians, as I was saying, to establish a school for every thirty children, a thing utterly impracticable and useless; and yet the contract was solemnly made, and the Government according to all rules ought at least, if they do not carry out the contract in its letter, carry it out in its spirit. Making a fair estimate, in 1884 we owed the confederated bands of Sioux a million and a half of money that we had failed to appropriate as we ought to have appropriated under that provision of the treaty of 1868. I do not remember how much more we owe them by the other provisions, but it is a very large amount. I can turn to it in a moment. The estimate made in 1883 of what was due these Indians by a failure on the part of the Government to keep the contract, after deducting all appropriations that had been made for schools and all purposes that were included in the contract, is something over $2,229,000. Add to that the million and a half, and there is something over three and a half million dollars due these Indians under the treaty of 1868, if we attempt to enforce the contract as we made it.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MANDERSON. There are perhaps twenty thousand of these Sioux. Does the Senator from Colorado think it would be advisable in the interest of the advancement of the Indians that the Government should pay to this nation of Indians the three or four million dollars that he says we owe them by reason of failure to fulfill the contract, and continue indefinitely to support them in the idleness in which they now live?

Mr. TELLER. I do not think it would be wise for the Government to pay all this money under the terms and according to the provisions of the treaty; but what I was coming at was that the Government should enforce all the provisions of this agreement and keep them honestly, or the Government should have the courage to say "we will deal with these Indians as we deal with our own people, legislate for them and not treat with them."

The last section but one of this bill provides that when this bill shall have passed both Houses of Congress and have received the sanction of the Executive, then it shall, before taking effect, have the sanction also of the Sioux Nation. If we were keeping implicitly and in good faith our contracts, there would be some propriety in keeping that provision in the bill, because it is provided in the treaty of 1868 that no further treaties or arrangements or agreements, or whatever you choose to call them, should be made with this tribe, except upon the sanction of three-fourths of the adult males of the tribe.

Now, why single out that particular portion of the contract and insist that these Indians shall have the veto power on the legislative body of the United States, when we are so palpably acting in violation of the more advantageous provisions to them, as they think, of the treaty of 1868? I would not carry out the contract by establishing a school for every thirty children, but I would carry out so much of the contract as requires us to furnish to each Indian family that had gone out on a farm a cow and a yoke of oxen, for that is to their advantage and tends to their civilization; and I would take the money that they are entitled to under the school clause and put sufficient educational facilities in their hands and within their right.

I have no objection to this bill except the one that I have mentioned. I think it violates the principle of proper legislation. In 1870 it was declared by a provision now in the Revised Statutes that no further treaties should be made with Indians, that they should no longer be recognized as a treaty-making power. It was evidently the purpose of the Legislature at that time to deal with them directly, as I say now they ought to be dealt with. I do not pretend to say that we ought not to give them 50 cents an acre, but I do say that it is no very great kindness to pile up money in the Treasury of the United States to be paid out to these Indians year after year to keep them paupers. The legislation of this country with reference to the Indian should be with a view to making him self-supporting, and not for the purpose of providing for the generation to come in idleness, and in consequence thereof in vice.

It is absolutely impossible to elevate the Indian race or any other race till in the sweat of their brow they are taught to earn their bread. No nation in the history of the world ever came up from savagery to civilization except it was by manual labor, and no nation ever will. You may give them $10 an acre if you choose for their lands, and pay them the interest annually, and the more you pay them the worse they are off, if you pay them in the way payments are now being made. One million seven hundred thousand dollars was spent last year for the support of the Sioux in the way of food and clothing alone! It is not in the interest of Indian civilization that this thing should be continued.

I have only called attention to this that I might enter my protest, as I did years ago in this body when formerly a member of it, against the attempt to treat these people as independent powers. The sooner you bring them within the provisions of American law and compel them to obey the law and give them the protection of the law and legislate here for them as you legislate for the rest of the people of the United States, the sooner you will put the Indian on the high road to civilization, and you never will do it with appropriations and gifts and schools and everything else until you do recognize his right to legislation as we legislate for all others.

The Indians are our wards. Who ever heard of a guardian or a trustee consulting his ward? Suppose when a guardian goes into court and presents his account it should appear that he had made an improper use of the money, and the court should call him to account, would he say, "My ward wanted me to expend it thus and thus?" He would be turned out of court. These people occupy the relation of wards to the nation, and it is our duty to legislate for them; and if we think they are wise we may consult them; if we think they are unwise, it is our duty to legislate against their will, for the Indian must be, if he is to be preserved, compelled to enter civilization whether he will or whether he wills it not.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, much that the Senator from Colorado has said I commend, and much that he has done heretofore in the administration of the Indian Department has my commendation. So far as I am concerned, I desire to give him full credit for much that has been done in the past for the advancement of the Indian. I desire now simply to say a few words in reference to his criticisms of this bill.

The Senator says that he does not see why we are required in this bill to conform to our treaty obligations with these Indians when we have confessedly failed to fulfill many other requirements in this treaty just as solemn. We have bound ourselves to furnish these Indians with oxen, with schools, and with school-houses, but we have never done it. He says, as an inference from that and as a justification, "why shall we conform to other stipulations in this agreement?" We bound ourselves when we bought certain lands of these Indians and told them that if they would surrender their titles to these lands we would give them this land. In consideration of that release on their part of their title to the lands we bound ourselves in these words:

> No treaty for the cession of any portion or part of the reservation herein described, which may be held in common, shall be of any validity or force as against the said Indians, unless executed and signed by at least three-fourths of all the adult male Indians occupying or interested in the same.

They parted with their own title to other lands, and took these lands under this stipulation in the title-deed. Their deed is the treaty. The Senator says he does not see why we should keep this obligation when we have not kept other obligations. He says that the Indians are our wards, and why should we ask the consent or opinion of our wards when we are disposing of their estate. Did he ever hear of a trustee coming into court and undertaking to defend himself for a violation of the law which governed his trust by setting up that in very many other things he had violated that law? I never did; the Senator may have; and I never heard of a court that would tolerate such a plea as that.

It is quite true that in very many other things, as the Senator says, in our dealings with these very wards since 1868 our delinquincies, if measured by dollars and cents, would amount to between three and four million dollars. Now, when we would make a feeble attempt here to conform to the treaty, when we propose to take from these Indians and open up to the public for settlement 11,000,000 acres of as fine land as there is in the great West, which if they were individually authorized to sell for themselves they could sell all the way from $3 to $10 an acre, when we propose to take that, we simply say to these Indians we will not take this land away from you for the public good except in conformity with the title-deed by which you hold it.

The Senator says we ought to rise above all our obligations, our contract, our treaty, and assert our legislative power above and beyond them all and dispose of this property just as if it was our own. Sir, that may be wise; it may be just; but it can not be based upon the fact that we have been doing that all along, that we have succeeded with impunity for many years in violating the obligations of our treaty to these individuals. It must be found somewhere else, and it must be founded upon some other notion of right and wrong than that which the Senator suggested. And therefore the Senator says that in 1870 we declared we would not make any more treaties with them, and the Senator has sought to draw the inference that because we passed the law that we would make no more treaties with them in 1870 therefore we were not bound by the treaties we had made. But the very statute which we passed saying we would make no more treaties with them contained a clause which I commend to all those who have an idea that because we are to make no more treaties with them therefore we are not bound by the treaties we have made, for while the statute says:

> No Indian nation or tribe within the Territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power with whom the United States may contract by treaty—> but no obligation of any treaty lawfully made and ratified with any such Indian nation or tribe prior to March 3, 1871, shall be hereby invalidated or impaired.

That was an honest declaration that we would keep all the contracts and obligations we had made up to that time, but instead of making contracts with them in the form of a treaty hereafter we would make a contract with them which should for its validity require the action of both Houses of Congress, and that is this. This is an agreement which is to be ratified by both Houses of Congress, but when we ask these Indians to part with these 10,00,000 acres of land in conformity with the treaty we say that this act shall not take effect until the Indians have signified their acceptance of it in conformity with the provisions of their treaty. That is the last section of the bill. That is keeping faith with them according to their treaty. It is providing what in the judgment of both Houses of Congress is for their best interest. It is making a proposition in advance to them, and it is asking them to accept it in accordance with the provisions of their treaty. As is suggested by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], it is the ordinary method of two parties having made a contract, getting together and modifying that contract according to existing circumstances and exigencies.

I know that the Senator from Colorado in his argument emphasized the delinquency of this Government in its failure heretofore to fulfill the stipulations of this treaty, which no one would think it would be wise to make now, but they are stipulations of a treaty, and are as binding upon the United States as any contract the United States is capable of making.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, what I meant to say and what I wanted to emphasize was that we should have a policy either to maintain inflexibly our treaty obligations or to abandon them. In my judgment, we made so many treaties impossible of execution, impossible of being carried out without detriment both to the Government and to the Indian, that the wise policy is the one I have suggested. The Revised Statutes provide—I think the section the Senator alluded to is not the one in force—"No Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power with whom the United States may contract by treaty; but no obligation of any treaty lawfully made," &c., shall be repudiated by the act. That was passed in 1871, and it was then intended to be a departure from the old system and the adoption of a new one and the one that I have suggested.

I say that we ought to do one thing or the other; we either ought to maintain the treaty obligations or we ought manfully to say that it is not well to maintain them, and we will legislate; and when we do legislate and when we are responsible and when the Indian has not been consulted, we shall legislate with a great deal more care and with a great deal more safety to the Indian than we have legislated for the last fifty years.

In 1880 I had the honor of protesting on this floor against the passage of a bill that received the almost unanimous support of this body. I protested against it as being inimical and injurious to the supposed beneficiaries of the bill, and to-day there is under that bill a tribe of Indians in Southern Colorado with a reservation 15 miles long and 110 miles wide. It would not be possible for an Indian to pass over from one end of the reservation to the other in a straight line; I presume it would take him three weeks, and at most seasons of the year it would be absolutely impossible for Indians or white men to pass over it at all. And yet the Indians were put there because the Indians wanted to go there, because they were incompetent to determine for themselves where they ought to go. I said then that the Government of the United States should put them where they ought to go, and not where the Indians thought they ought to go. There has been trouble ever since down there. Within the last few months several Indians have been killed in Colorado because of the conflict that arises on account of a reservation so narrow as that. The Indians' stock can not be kept on it, and the white men's stock can not be kept off, and it is a continual source of friction. I have a letter, received this morning, stating that there was danger that these Indians would be massacred whenever they got off the reservation. They have gone off and killed cattle, and they have irritated and aggravated settlers on both sides of the line, both in New Mexico and in Colorado, and their safety will demand that the United States Government remove them from that place whether they will go willingly or not. These same Indians were sent, contrary to their will, onto the reservation, and then when they concluded it was a good enough place as long as the Government paid them their annuities, they thought they would stay, and then we said because they wanted to stay, "We will not take them off."

I do not advocate the violation of any treaty as long as we profess to abide by the treaties; but what I have contended for ever since I have been a member of this body is that it is the duty of the Government not to treat these people as powers, not to treat them as sovereignties, but to treat them, if not as citizens, at least as entitled to the protection of the General Government; and I say now, after an experience of twenty-five years on the frontier, with an experience with the Indians that I do not think is second to that of anybody, with a knowledge of the Indians from coming in contact with them, that the legislation for twenty-five years, if devised by their enemies, could not have accomplished their ruin much more certainly than it has in all parts of the country with which I have been familiar; and if the legislation was brought home to us, and we and we alone were responsible, you could not pass through this body bills to put the Indians on arid land where they would starve to death, and where a white man would starve to death, simply because the Indian said he was willing to go or he wanted to go.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not concur in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. It will be noticed that he reserves to the Indian, the bill after the amendment will still reserve to the Indian, who is himself a settler and having an improved farm, some improved lands and possibly a house upon that part of the reservation which is thrown open to settlement, the option to leave that and go upon the reservation constituted by this bill. If he has the option to do that, if we offer him another allotment on the reservation, then we ought to make some provision by which if he elect to take that allotment he can have compensation for that which he leaves. It will be a matter of negotiation. He can get it now. It leaves him at the mercy of the person who may want a homesteader's claim. He may go to him and say by way of stimulating his choice, "If you will give up this place that you now live upon and go onto the reservation I will give you a pony for what you have got here." So it leaves the Indian open to this sort of inducements from the settlers to make this option which we reserve to him in the bill. That being the case, it seems to me that the matter of the compensation which he is to have ought to be under some supervision, because, even after the Senator has stricken out the words to which his amendment refers, there is still the opportunity that the white man may buy him out of his claim without any supervision as to the negotiations.

I think, therefore, it would be better to let the words stand and to incorporate the amendment I proposed, so that the homesteader who takes his land, if there are valuable improvements upon it, should be under the supervision of the Interior Department as to what those are worth when he takes them if the Indian decides to go.

I think further that there should be an amendment just above, in section 7, providing that the election of the Indian should be in some way recorded, so that if an Indian happens to-day to be gone from his settlement some settler may not assume that he has elected to leave it and move in upon it. I would, therefore, propose, in line 5, after the word "option," to insert:

By recording his election with the proper agent at the agency to which he belongs.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PLUMB. Is that the amendment to strike out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

A division being called for, the ayes were 3.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the amendment may be withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has a right to withdraw it, as it has not been amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe an amendment of mine is pending; I think it is at the desk. It is to insert after the word "fair" the words:

To be paid by the person who shall afterwards take up such lands under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. PLUMB. That is just as indefinite, I think, as the provision is now. By what tribunal is it to be settled? What tribunal is to settle the time and manner of payment? For instance, suppose the Indian does not take the allotment to which he is entitled, and some one goes on then and settles upon the land, remains there four or five years according to this bill, pays the money to the Government, and then demands, as he has a right to do under the law, his patent? Is the Secretary of the Interior to say to this man, "You shall not have your patent until you have paid this money?" And to whom shall he pay it? It seems to me that the original proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts ought to have been adopted. We ought to strike out that entire provision unless we are prepared to go into a very elaborate system of execution. I know that in the case of the Kaw Indians in Kansas that provision was attempted to be made for their benefit, and the appraisal which was made of improvements cost more than the value of the improvements. In all these cases my judgment is that it will cost the Government as much to make the appraisement and see that the money gets into proper hands as it will be worth after it gets there.

In addition to that, as a general thing, as has been said here very well, the improvements are usually of the most trifling character. It will be very hard, except in the case of some person who is very kindly inclined to the Indians, to fix any value on them at all. They may be made, therefore, the subject of a very trifling valuation or of a very exaggerated valuation, and it seems to me that it is a subject which we ought not to enter upon at all. I believe I will renew the motion the Senator from Massachusetts made, if that is in order, to strike out.

Mr. HARRISON. It can hardly be in order now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment is now pending, the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I move an amendment to come in after the word "fair"——

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me, this seems to be seesawing back and forth. It is very clear that if my amendment is not adopted this whole thing ought to be stricken out.

Mr. PLUMB. I will move to strike out the provision.

Mr. HARRISON. I will withdraw any point of order if the Senator from Kansas moves to strike out.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it is very clear that ought to be done. We shall simply get into a maze of detail of administration, which will not only be expensive, but without practical result to anybody.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 13, line 13, after the word "fair," it is proposed to insert:

Whenever it shall come to the knowledge of the President that any land allotted under the provisions of this act shall have been abandoned for more than two years, he may, in his discretion, by proclamation declare said land so abandoned open to homestead settlement under the provisions of this act.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall move, first, to strike out, and then I move to insert what has been read. I move to strike out all between the word "any" and the word "fair."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 13, after the word "provided," in line 9, it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "fair," in line 13, as follows:

Any Indian declining, within one year after this act shall take effect, this allotment, shall be entitled to such compensation for any improvements by him made upon said land as shall seem to the Secretary of the Interior just and fair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate its unfinished business, being the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the regular order may be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is entitled to the floor on the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. I rose simply to state that after I had moved to strike out this clause the suggestions of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] were of such a character as led me to doubt the propriety of it. Still it is so small a matter that it is easier for the bill to get through by striking it out. I am satisfied that the provision shall be stricken out and the hardship of it I think will be very small, and therefore, on the whole, I shall adhere to the amendment now moved by the Senator from Kansas to strike it out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am advised by several Senators around me that this bill will take an hour, or two or three hours more. If so, I think we had better go on with the regular order; but if the Senator from Massachusetts can get through with this bill in half an hour I have no objection to its being concluded.

Mr. DAWES. I had the expectation that it would be disposed of in half an hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator on my right [Mr. HARRISON] tells me he has some amendments to offer.

Mr. HARRISON. They may not take time.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let me suggest this course: There are two or three amendments here that are entirely local in their character and we can get those out of the road in a few minutes. I think the debate will be caused by the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. Is there a pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] has submitted an amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that it be stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the regular order will be laid aside for the purpose of proceeding with the bill under consideration at 2 o'clock. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas is to strike out in section 13, line 9, beginning with the word "any," all down to and including the word "fair," in line 13.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the next amendment, proposed by the Senator from Kansas, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "provided," in line 9 of section 13, it is proposed to insert:

Whenever it shall come to the knowledge of the President that any land allotted under the provisions of this act shall have been abandoned for more than two years, he may, in his discretion, by proclamation declare said land so abandoned open to homestead settlement under the provisions of this act.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to mean that that shall apply to lands allotted within these reservations?

Mr. PLUMB. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that would be a surprise to the Senator from Massachusetts. These lands are set apart in a reservation.

Mr. PLUMB. Oh, no; not on the allotments within the limits of the reservations that are to be patented all together.

Mr. HARRISON. But the language used by the Senator is broad enough, because it refers to all the lands alloted under the provisions of this act, which also includes allotments on the reservations that are provided for by this act.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think that follows, because the provision is this:

That any Indian * * * residing upon any portion of said great reservation not included in either of the separate reservations herein established may, at his option, have the allotment to which he would be otherwise entitled, &c.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true; but that limitation is not extended to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. Perhaps that should be limited to the allotment provided for in this section.

Mr. HARRISON. That would do.

Mr. PLUMB. I was not observing the fact that there was provision for allotments on the reservations. I will modify the amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. Pending the modification of the amendment I wish to ask the action of the Senate upon another amendment that is agreed to by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. There are two islands in front of the towns of Chamberlin and Pierre, in Dakota, that by this bill are donated to the two towns respectively for park purposes. In the Niobrara River there is a small island known as the Niobrara Island, in immediate front of the town of Niobrara. Niobrara is a thriving town, the equal of either Chamberlin or Pierre, not only in its present municipal importance, but in its expectations for the future; and I ask that these amendments be introduced in section 20 and be acted upon pending the change of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas——

Mr. PLUMB. I have already changed my amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas has been modified. It will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "provided," in line 9 of section 13, it is proposed to insert:

Whenever it shall come to the knowledge of the President that any land allotted under the provisions of this section shall have been abandoned for more than two years, he may in his discretion by proclamation declare said lands so abandoned open to homestead settlement under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I now offer an amendment for the purpose of reaching the case of Niobrara Island that I have described. There are two amendments reaching the same subject-matter. On page 18, section 20, line 2, after the words "Farm Island," I move to insert "and Niobrara Island."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I now move to strike out the word "and" before "Farm Island," so as to make the phrase grammatical.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANDERSON. The next amendment I have to offer reaching the same idea is, at the end of section 20, to insert:

Niobrara Island, an island in the Niobrara River, near Niobrara, and now a part of the Sioux reservation, is hereby donated to the said city of Niobrara: Provided, further, That the said city of Niobrara shall formally accept the same within one year from the passage of this act, upon the express condition that the same shall be preserved and used for all time entirely as a public park, and for no other purpose, to which all persons shall have free access; and said city shall have authority to adopt all proper rules and regulations for the improvement and care of said park, subject to modification by the President of the United States; and upon the failure of any of said conditions the said island shall revert to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to recall the attention of the Senate to section 13. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment I suggested a few moments ago. This section provides for an option to be exercised by the Indian, by which he abandons his reservation in that part thrown open to settlement and takes an allotment upon the reservation established by the bill. There ought to be some way of recording it.

Mr. DAWES. I will agree to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I propose, after the word "option," in line 5 of section 13, if no other amendment comes in there, the insertion of these words:

By recording his election with the proper agent at the agency to which he belongs.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that that ought to be amended somewhat. The location ought to be platted as well as recorded, and a copy of that should be sent to the office of the Interior Department. It is to be a muniment of title practically, and that ought to be deposited first or last in the Department from which all title is derived. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the word "platted," so as to read:

Platted and recorded, and a copy of which shall also be filed in the Interior Department.

Mr. HARRISON. The trouble is that the Senator imposes upon the Indian the duty of platting his land.

Mr. PLUMB. No; the Secretary of the Interior will make some arrangement about that, I suppose. The Indian can plat it just as well as he can record it. I think, on the whole, he can do that a great deal better.

Mr. HARRISON. The recording is simply signing a proper paper in the office of the agent. The platting certainly involves some survey.

Mr. PLUMB. It is all surveyed. The section and quarter-section on which he is situated would have to be noted.

Mr. HARRISON. Would it not be better to add at the end:

And a plat of such abandoned location shall be made and forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. PLUMB. This is not in regard to the abandoned allotments, as I understand it, but in regard to those that are to be occupied. It is for the purpose of giving definiteness and certainty, as I suppose, to the metes and bounds of the occupation.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Kansas I think is mistaken as to the effect of this. This is the case of Indians who have present allotments on the lands thrown open to settlement. This bill gives them the election to abandon those allotments and go on the reservation. My object was to have some record of the fact of the abandonment of the allotment on the public lands so that it might be definitely settled in case of dispute whether he had or had not abandoned it.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Hr. HARRISON].

Mr. CHACE. Let that be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 5 of section 13, after the word "option," it is proposed to insert:

By recording his election with the proper agent at the agency to which he belongs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I now offer amendments in the form of two additional sections, to come in at the end of the bill. I ask that the reporting of the amendments at this time be omitted, as it is not intended to proceed further with the consideration of the bill, but to take up the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. As those amendments may possibly cause some debate, I feel that I can hardly ask the Senate to continue over into the regular business the consideration of this bill; but I should like to have it go over so as not to lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over informally, the Senate proceeding to the consideration of the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the bill be printed, with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] gave notice some days ago that he would to-morrow ask the Senate to consider the Dakota bill. If it is not disagreeable to the Senator from Indiana, I desire to move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next, if the Senator from Indiana will allow his notice to go over until Monday.

Mr. HARRISON. I will not make objection to that. I shall be ready myself to proceed with the consideration of that matter to-morrow; but if it is the desire of the Senate to adjourn until Monday I shall not interpose that business in the way, with the understanding that my notice stands for Monday, and that at 2 o'clock on that day, if I can not reach it earlier, I can have consent to take up that bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I make the motion, then, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have no purpose to inflict a long speech upon the Senate on the electoral bill. I think, however, that this important question ought to be considered at a time when we are as free as we ever can be from political bias. I believe that this bill affects a question that is more dangerous to the future of this country than probably any other. For twenty years it has been debated in this Senate Chamber whether we could not devise some mode better than the present one to count the electoral vote. Various expedients have been proposed by able Senators, and they have always been approached with an acknowledgment of the difficulties in the way, and yet with an earnest desire by every one of both parties to reach a satisfactory conclusion.

For a long time, I think for fifteen or twenty years, we had a joint rule to regulate the mode of counting the vote. That proved to be unsatisfactory, and when a critical time arose, it being within the power of either House, the joint rule was withdrawn, and the result was that this most important duty of counting the electoral vote, this most important act of the people of the United States, is now without law or rule to govern the mode and manner of its procedure.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections for a number of years has given to it its careful consideration, and I think two or three times has reported without a division, certainly with no division on party lines, a proposition, but with the distinct understanding and feeling among them all that it was not entirely satisfactory, and that all that could be hoped for would be to bring about a conference with the other House, and in that way come to some satisfactory solution of this most difficult problem.

Mr. President, the bill that has twice passed the Senate and been sent to the House, rather with a view to gain a conference than otherwise, is now before us again. A conference was defeated by the unwillingness of either House to abate its ideas on this question, and it now comes before us again at the beginning of an administration, when no party advantage can be derived from our decision, when the Senate is clearly on one side in party politics and the House clearly is on the other; and now, if ever, this matter ought to be settled upon some basis of principle.

The bill before the Senate in its general provisions, those which are merely legislative or regulating the mode and manner of proceeding, is not objected to by any one. The critical points involved are two, and they are both presented by the fourth section. This bill provides that in case of but one return from a State, when the two Houses shall meet according to the provisions of the Constitution the votes shall be opened by the presiding officer of the Senate, in whose custody they have been, and that they shall then be counted. That mandatory provision is the only mandatory provision in the Constitution on this subject, that the votes of the electors "shall then be counted."

There is no mode pointed out in the Constitution by which they must be counted. No provision is made in the Constitution for a dispute as to the legality of the votes of the electors, whether the electors have conformed to the Constitution, whether one set of electors or another set of electors have been elected; no provision whatever pointing out either any authority or any person or any body to decide which of two sets of electors shall be counted, or whether the votes of some of the electors on account of their being ineligible shall be rejected or whether the State was in a condition to have its vote counted, or whether an act of Providence, such as a snow-storm that occurred in the case of Wisconsin or some other accident, prevented the electors from voting at the time fixed by the Constitution—in none of these cases is there a mode provided by law by which these questions are to be determined. It all rests in the single provision contained in a single paragraph of the twelfth amendment to the Constitution. Upon its construction all these matters, of which I intend to speak very briefly, depend. There is no declaration that the President of the Senate, who opens the electoral vote, shall count them, or that the House or the Senate either shall pass upon the question of counting. This is the clause:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

It is to be presumed that the framers of the Constitution did not foresee and could not foresee the difficulties that have arisen since upon this matter. The constitutional provision as to the election of President was unsatisfactory to the framers of the Constitution, and it was changed after the celebrated difficulty when it was a long time in doubt whether Aaron Burr or Thomas Jefferson should be President of the United States. This demonstrated that the original provision of the Constitution was faulty, and our predecessors of that day undertook to correct it and adopted a new provision, but that new provision presents many of the same difficulties that occurred under the old, and to this day Congress has never been able to solve any of them.

Since that time there have been eleven cases of disputes as to electoral votes, and twenty-one objections have been made to the electoral votes of different States, presenting a great variety of questions. For instance, in the Missouri case the question came up whether the vote of Missouri, which before being admitted as a State undertook to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, should be counted. That created a difficulty which was finally solved by the men of those days by simply resolving that whether it was counted or not it would make no difference in the result, and they therefore passed it by.

Again, when the electors of Wisconsin had been prevented by a great snow-storm in the Northwest, just in the midst of winter, from meeting at the place appointed by the Constitution at the time designated by law, they were unable to convene and could not vote according to the Constitution, but met the next day and voted and sent their votes here to be counted. I remember as well as I remember the countenances that are now before me the scene of riot and tumult, of disorder and confusion, that arose when the question about Wisconsin came up in 1857, when Mr. Buchanan was elected President of the United States. I never saw the House in a condition of tumult and disorder more violent than occurred then. The President of the Senate, Mr. Mason, undertook to give a construction to this clause of the Constitution, which was at once met by violent outcry not only from members of the House but from members of the Senate, and it led to the separation of the two Houses in confusion and the return of the Senate to this Chamber, and the only way by which the difficulty could be solved at that time was by passing a resolution that whether Wisconsin was counted or not the result was the same, that James Buchanan was elected President of the United States.

And so, sir, in the many cases that have occurred since that time where the votes of several States were in dispute, especially after the reconstruction period, the same difficulties arose and were solved in the way I have mentioned, by saying that whatever way the disputed vote was counted the people have elected by their electors a President of the United States. And, sir, in my judgment, if in 1869 the election of President Grant had depended upon the vote of the State of New York, after it had been made public and was generally known all over the country that the election in the city of New York had been carried by overwhelming fraud, I do not believe the people of the United States would have been satisfied with any result that depended upon the vote of the State of New York. But there again, fortunately for the country, we were able to avoid the difficulty by the fact that, however New York might be counted, it would not change the result. No question was made about the vote of the State of New York at that time, because it was known that however it was counted—and it was counted upon the face of the papers for Mr. Seymour—it would be acquiesced in, because it made no change in the result.

Several times that condition of affairs existed, until finally, in 1877, we came to a point that did really threaten our national existence; when civil war might have occurred under certain circumstances; where the disputed votes did change the result; where a change even to the extent of one vote might have altered the result. That was happily avoided by a contrivance—for I can not call it much more, and I suppose Senators did not think it much more; I did not support it at the time, but it was a wise measure—by which a solution was brought about of this difficulty without producing actual contention and strife.

I feel, therefore, that this is a vital question that we ought to decide. We ought to approach it without regard to party division, and try to resolve, if we can, this most difficult question of American politics.

The objection I have to this bill is that it does not solve the most dangerous of these contentions. It does not settle a single one of those that have arisen in the past or that are likely to arise in the future. This bill makes a distinction between the votes of electors from States where there is but one return and votes from States where there are two or more returns or papers purporting to be returns. This is a distinction without a difference, because in any case of a dispute that may arise the manufacturing or creating of double returns is the easiest possible process to present the question involved. If there is but one return, then this bill provides that the return shall not be excluded except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses.

If the two Houses disagree as to the validity of the return, then the vote is counted. But suppose on that return or from evidence on file it appears that some of the electors claimed to be elected from the disputed State were ineligible, were members of Congress or judges of the courts or officers of the United States, and therefore ineligible to be electors, how would that question be determined where the matter in dispute did not go to the whole electoral vote, but only to a part of it?

I suppose that under a strict construction of this section, in that case the votes would have to be counted, and therefore votes that are declared by the Constitution itself to be illegal would have to be recorded in making up the result.

There are many supposable cases. Suppose that one House in the future should determine that in a case like that of Wisconsin the vote ought to be counted and the other House should determine that it ought not to be counted, how would this rule determine it? I presume that on the strict language of the bill the vote of Wisconsin would be counted because the two Houses disagreed, and in that particular case where the informality grew out of an act of Providence that would be right; but I could name many cases where it would be wrong, where a difference between the two Houses would compel the counting of an electoral vote when it ought not to be counted.

Even in such a case how shall it be counted, by whom shall it be counted, and who shall declare the result? But I could overcome these doubts; I would not stand in opposition to this bill because it does not solve all possible disputes. I can see that there ought to be some mode of determining questions arising at the count, and if the two Houses, who are made by the Constitution the witnesses of this act, agree upon the counting of a certain vote, I would regard that as the best solution. Where the two Houses agree, the vote ought to be counted; the two Houses may properly be regarded as the judges of whether the vote ought to be counted; but if they disagree, why should you give to the opinion of one House more weight than to the opinion of the other? Why should we say that in case of disagreement the vote shall be counted? Who will count the vote? The tellers? That leaves it still in confusion.

Mr. HOAR. If the honorable Senator will pardon me, I think in this particular it is proper to interrupt him for a moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand, the bill provides for the process of counting. I do not rise now to answer the Senator's argument, but to point out an insufficient comprehension of the bill itself. The bill provides a certain process to be gone through with, and it then declares:

> And the votes having been ascertained and counted in the manner and according to the rules in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate.

The bill provides for tellers, members of the two Houses and their representatives, who are to receive a certain statement purporting to be the certificate of a State of its action in a matter which the Constitution most carefully commits to State action. The theory of this bill is that when a State presents itself and by but one utterance declares, "This has been my action," it shall be counted as the constitutional action of the State, unless both Houses of Congress agree to reject it. When there are two voices, each purporting to be—of course not each actually, but each purporting to be—the declaration of the State what its action has been, then it requires the concurrence of the two Houses to accept one and reject the other. Of course in each case it is a rejection of something.

And now, without going at this time into the argument in favor of the wisdom, as far as it goes, of this provision in comparison with the existing law, that is the proposition of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator does not yet meet the difficulty. Suppose the question is not merely upon the admission or the legality of the vote at the time, a question that affects the whole vote of a State, but suppose that some of the electors are ineligible?

Mr. HOAR. My friend will pardon me; I did not rise to meet the difficulty; I did not undertake to address myself to that; I rose simply to answer the question put by the Senator from Ohio, who was to count under the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the Senator answers that question. Here is the language of the bill. Where there is but one return the bill provides as it now stands:

> And no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative votes of both Houses.

This permits both Houses acting in concord at the time to reject the vote of a State, for it provides that in case there is a division of the two Houses a vote shall be counted. What vote? The whole vote or part of the vote in dispute?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does my friend from Ohio wish for an explanation now?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I think it would interrupt me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That might be so, but I think there is a perfect answer to what my friend has said. I will reserve it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I could overcome in my own mind—and the subject has often been a matter of conversation as well as debate in the Committee on Privileges and Elections—the difficulty in this matter, because I can see that this provision might be sustained, that if both Houses agreed to accept a vote that probably was as good evidence as we could have; but suppose they agree to reject the vote of a State? That is a dangerous power. That allows the two Houses of Congress, which are not armed with any constitutional power whatever over the electoral system, to reject the vote of every elector from every State, with or without cause, provided they are in harmony in that matter.

It was one chief object of the framers of the Constitution to separate as wide as the poles the election of electors from the power of the legislative branch. That is plainly shown by the debates. It was at one time proposed, as has been adopted in France, to allow the Congress to elect the President, but this was rejected as being dangerous to our system of government, and therefore the framers of our Government selected an entirely distinct body of men, of the same number it is true, but chosen in a different way by the States, to perform the high duty of selecting a President of the United States, and the Constitution gives to Congress no power whatever over that great act except the power to be present at the count of the votes and to see the result declared. All the rest of the power drawn from that clause of the Constitution which I have read is inferential.

Now, sir, even this proposition—to which I might agree from the difficulty of pointing out a better way to pass upon the count—does violate the idea of the framers of the Constitution that the election of a President should be by electors separate from the legislative or law-making power of the country. The President speaks the voice of the States and of the people. He is chosen by electors elected in the several States according to the laws of each State; and yet this bill confers power upon Congress, the two Houses being in harmony with each other, to exclude the vote of any State.

But that is not my chief difficulty. The difficulty with me grows out of another clause of the bill. I ought to say the second section of the bill provides a mode by which the legality of the appointment of electors may be decided according to the laws of each State by judicial interpretation. I see some objection to that, but at the same time I do not make any point against it. Then the fourth section provides:

> And in such case of more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State, if there shall have been no such determination of the question in the State aforesaid, then those votes, and those only, shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide to be the lawful votes of the legally appointed electors of such State.

This gives to either House of Congress in the case of a double return the power to exclude the vote of New York or of any other State in the Union, not by the will of the two Houses, but by the veto of either House. We know the frailties of human nature well enough to know that the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, though great political bodies, as deserving of respect as probably any that have ever been elected under a republican system of government or any other, yet after all we are human, and are governed by passions and by prejudices and by party bias and by party feeling—I ask you whether it is safe to confer upon either House the power by its simple vote to reject the electoral vote of any State because there are two returns from it. If this was a case that could only arise in rare events it would be different, but the cases of double returns can be provided for in every election in any State at each Presidential election. Suppose a dispute arises, suppose the question shall arise whether a Republican body of electors or a Democratic body of electors have been elected in any particular State, and there is an honest difference of opinion as to which was elected. We recently had an important instance where in the State of New York the whole matter turned upon a thousand votes. Suppose there had been a question between the Republicans and Democrats as to the legality of that count and the regularity of those proceedings, and there had been a meeting of two bodies of electors, the Republican electors and the Democratic electors in New York, and double returns from those two opposing bodies had come here to be counted, representing two political parties; suppose the Senate of the United States should be Republican as now and the House Democratic as now, and that question arose between the two parties in a great State which would affect and control the results of the election, and that question was to be decided by the majority votes in these several Houses.

Here is a case where the vote of either House might under this bill defeat an election. If the Senate should reject the vote of a State, and thus secure a party advantage, the House could reject the vote of another State to obtain a like advantage, and a contention would spring up which would prevent the election of a President of the United States. Here is the difficulty with this bill, and I wish I could overcome it. I do not think we have the power under the Constitution to give to either House the right to exclude the vote of a State. The Constitution says that in the presence of the two Houses the votes shall be counted. That is all there is mandatory in the Constitution as to the election. Congress has no right to go behind those votes. The votes must be counted one way or the other, for or against, and we can not by a bill of our framing here enable either House upon this case of double returns to exclude a State from the count. It not only goes to the extent of double returns, but it goes further——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to inquire of the Senator, as part of this very interesting statement, what in his judgment is the existing law on that subject; that is, who is to count the vote now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to that in a moment. I will answer that. I am perfectly willing to come to that, and propose to do so in a moment.

This not only provides for the case of double returns, but it provides for the case of more than one return, or "paper purporting to be a return," from a State; and in some of the cases I have seen of the counting of the electoral votes for President I have heard papers read purporting to be returns which were ridiculous, frivolous, foolish; still they were properly read, because the presiding officer can do nothing but to lay before the two Houses all the papers. So it provides not only for two formal returns by contesting electors but any paper purporting to be a return.

Now, not only is the question sometimes involved which of two sets of electors are the legal electors, but the question often arises as to whether the electors themselves were competent to be electors, whether a particular elector received the requisite number of votes, or whether some of both tickets may not have been elected, as occurred in some of the earlier cases in the history of the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It occurred in California within a short time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; a case may frequently occur where the question does not extend to the whole electoral vote of the State, but only to a part of it, or to an individual member.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this is not a constitutional measure; that it does not provide what the Constitution provides for, the counting of the vote, but it provides for the exclusion of the vote upon the mandate of either House. I have no doubt whatever of the power of Congress to do all that is necessary to regulate the mode and manner of counting the vote. I think that power is as plainly given by the Constitution as any power expressed or implied, because in the absence of any provision in the Constitution itself to carry it into execution the Constitution confers upon Congress full power to regulate the mode and manner of carrying into effect all the granted powers, and therefore of counting the vote, but with this one limitation upon the power of Congress, which stands like a rock in the Constitution, that "the vote shall then be counted." Nothing can be done under color of law by the action of the two Houses to prevent the count of the vote, because "the votes must then be counted."

I now come to a question of greater difficulty. How are you to deal with this? The Senator from Massacbusetts asked me what I proposed to do.

Mr. HOAR. Under the existing law what is to be done?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is now no law or rule except the Constitution.

Mr. HOAR. My learned friend did not understand my question. My question was not by what other methods he proposed dealing with it, but where the existing authority is now, as he understands, to determine all these questions. I am not speaking of the distinction between an act of Congress and the Constitution, but I suppose if two returns come from a State or one return about which questions of law are raised somebody must determine it. He says Congress must not. Where has the authority from the beginning of the Government to this day been lodged to do this thing that somebody must do?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I have answered that already.

Mr. HOAR. I did not hear the answer.

Mr. SHERMAN. Congress has undoubted power under the residuary clause in the Constitution giving powers to Congress to pass all laws suitable and necessary to carry into execution the express grants of power. Here is a provision in the Constitution for the election of electors, and therefore the mode and manner by which the votes of electors may be counted may be pointed out, but Congress shall not provide that the votes shall not be counted, because the Constitution says that the votes shall be counted then and there.

Mr. HOAR. I must have shown a great want of clearness in putting my question. The question which I ask the honorable Senator from Ohio was not whether Congress had the power to make a law for the future; not, if it had, what law he would make; but to make his statement complete, that I might understand his constitutional theory, I wanted him to state where the power had been, not to provide for a method but to do this thing for the twenty-four Presidential elections we have had. Who had the right to count the vote in John Adams's day, or Thomas Jefferson's, or Mr. Grant's, or Mr. Hayes's, or Mr. Garfield's? Was it the Vice-President, or was it nobody, or was it the two Houses of Congress?

Mr. SHERMAN. I said before that I had no doubt about the power of Congress to pass a law prescribing the ordinary proceeding, the mode and manner of counting the vote, how the list should be prepared, how the returns should be made, what should be done with them, and all the necessary steps that lead to the counting of the vote; but when that vote is to be counted in the presence of the two Houses, Congress has no right to interfere at the critical moment and say that the two Houses while engaged in this business shall separate, and that either House may in case of a double return declare that the vote shall not be counted. That is the point. There is a limit to the power of Congress in this respect. Its power to pass laws to carry into execution provisions of the Constitution does not give Congress power to override the plain mandate of the Constitution. That is the only answer I can make to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. Then, if the Senator will pardon me, I understand as the basis of his constitutional argument that he avows that for the last ninety-six years, I think——

Mr. SHERMAN. Do not impute to me language that I did not utter.

Mr. HOAR. There has been no lawful authority to count the votes in the Presidential election in existence under our Constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I never said such a thing in the world.

Mr. HOAR. That is the substance of what the Senator said.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say there is lawful authority to count the vote, it must be counted, but you can not allow one House to prevent the vote from being counted. You can not make a law that would deprive the people of the United States of the power to elect electors whose vote shall be counted. You may prescribe the mode and manner and form, the clerical work, and all that sort of thing, but when it comes to counting the vote you can not interpose a law and say that no vote shall be counted unless the Senate agrees to it or unless the House agrees to it. The vote shall be counted.

All the proceedings had heretofore have been recorded and are set out in this book and in the books that I hold in my hand. They show every case where these difficulties have arisen and were put aside as not changing the result of the election at the time to be dealt with. Therefore it is that now, when we have no Presidential election in view, when the two Houses are of opposing parties, I desire, if possible, to find some way that will enable us to count the vote according to the Constitution.

The Senator will no doubt remember the position I took when this question was before us in 1876. Then there was no law on the subject. The joint rules had been abandoned. The two Houses could not agree upon the mode of counting the vote. We discussed it day after day. Then it was that the plan of an electoral commission was gotten up. I did not believe in the constitutionality of that plan. It was a wise solution of a great difficulty; it operated well; but I should like to have the provision pointed out to me which authorized Congress to make such a tribunal for such a purpose. I could not think so then; but I was glad, and will be glad to see agreed upon now any mode of solution that will secure a settlement of the question.

I have never claimed that the Constitution conferred upon the President of the Senate the absolute power to count the vote. All that I have said, and the substance of what I said, was based upon the remark made by Chancellor Kent in his Commentaries, in which he says:

> The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted. In the case of questionable votes, and a closely contested election, this power may be all-important; and, I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result; and that the House are present only as spectators to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors. (Kent's Commentaries, volume 1, page 277.)

What I have contended is that the power of the presiding officer of the Senate to count the vote in the absence of all other legislation, resting alone upon the provisions of the Constitution, naked and unchanged, might be fairly inferred from the Constitution. This officer opens the returns, hands them to the tellers, performs the ordinary duty of a presiding officer, and declares the result. What may be the legal effect of that declaration I never have pretended to say. It is not final and conclusive upon the people of the United States. On the contrary, my opinion has always been that if the declaration made there in the presence of the two Houses is not satisfactory or is contested, the House of Representatives may then meet and upon their authority to do a certain act in a certain event may decide that the time had arrived for them to perform their duty and proceed to elect a President of the United States, and that the Senate, under like circumstances, on the failure of the electoral college to produce a result, might also proceed to elect a Vice-President of the United States. This would at once present a contest for the courts to decide.

I do not give these opinions with any desire to excite controversy, but only with a desire to produce a solution of this question. I am satisfied that the bill as it stands is not a proper solution, nor would I vote now to confer such a power upon a presiding officer or upon any man. I think Congress ought to do its duty in this behalf and make other provision, and not leave to any human being alone to exercise so great and important a power.

There are three ways which have been proposed at different times to solve the questions that may arise in the presence of the two Houses upon the vote of any State as to its legality in whole or in part. As to the form and time and manner in which these questions should be decided, there ought to be ample provisions by law—some tribunal provided to whom all questions should be referred. It has been suggested that the President of the Senate should be clothed with that power. I do not believe it, except in the absence of all legislation, when I think it is a part of his duty as a presiding officer to announce the result, leaving to others to determine the legal effect of that announcement. But I do not believe in that mode. It would be totally unsatisfactory, and I would vote for no bill which would confer such a power.

Another plan which has been proposed in the debates at different times, and I think also in the constitutional convention, was to allow questions of this kind to be certified at once to the Supreme Court for its decisions in case of a division between the two Houses. If the House should be one way and the Senate the other, then it was proposed to let the case be referred directly to the prompt and summary decision of the Supreme Court. But there is a feeling in this country that we ought not to mingle our great judicial tribunal with political questions, and therefore this proposition has not met with much favor. It would be a very grave fault indeed and a very serious objection to refer a political question in which the people of the country were aroused, about which their feelings were excited, to this great tribunal, which after all has to sit upon the life and property of all the people of the United States. It would tend to bring that court into public odium of one or the other of the two great parties. Therefore that plan may probably be rejected as an unwise provision. I believe, however, it is the provision made in other countries.

I think it is so in Mexico; and my impression is that it is so in France, but I have not recently read their constitution. In France the election is made by their legislative bodies. Therefore I regard it as being on the whole not a wise provision to refer the question to the Supreme Court.

What other remedy is open? After all the forms provided by the law shall have been gone through with, and after a marked and decided vote between the two Houses shows that one is on the one side and one on the other, I know no better way than to bring the two Houses into joint convention, and there polling each House separately to decide the result by a vote of a majority of the representatives of the people and the representatives of the States combined.

I know that in the Senate this usually has not been considered with much favor. In the first blush I did not myself like it. The Senate of the United States being a smaller body than the House of Representatives naturally does not wish to see its power blended in and formed as a part of the whole of which it is but a comparatively small part. In ordinary matters I would reject this as being a departure from the separate and independent action of our two legislative bodies, one the representatives of the States, the other the representatives of the people. But when you have examined all other remedies proposed this seems to me the wisest solution of this question.

This very proposition was adopted with great wisdom by the Senate of the United States by the act of 1866 prescribing the mode of electing members of this body. Our Constitution declares that the electors shall be chosen according to the laws of the States. Our Constitution also declares that the members of this body shall be chosen by the Legislatures of the States. In every State of our Union two bodies compose the Legislature. In 1866 Congress declared that if the two Houses should disagree upon the election of a Senator they should meet together in joint convention and decide that matter by a majority vote of the members voting.

The same repugnance existed in that case as in this. It was the Legislature that was to act, and yet our people stood for seventy years the inconvenience of the old system before they proposed this radical remedy. For a time Ohio was not represented in the Senate, because the senate of the State was one way and the house was the other, and they would not agree to go into joint convention. Nearly every State in the Union had been from time to time partly unrepresented by the contests that grew out of the election of United States Senators.

At one time before the passage of that law there were several vacant seats in this body, made vacant by the want of unanimity in the two legislative bodies of a State. Before that time the case often occurred when a pending controversy over a United States Senator hung the Legislature in doubt for one or two and sometimes three years, divided it politically, and entered into all business of the Assembly, and was made the basis of corrupt propositions, until the election of Senator in the old-fashioned way became—I can scarcely use any word strong enough—it became the mere plunder of political contention and barter. That was the old way.

Finally the two Houses were brought to a concurrence by corrupt arrangements that had been made beforehand. So it was alleged at the time that the law was passed. In the case in New Jersey, which I believe was the immediate cause of the passage of that law, the case of Stockton, the matter was hung here in the Senate and we debated over it for days and days, and we all could see that in the speedy future, unless that controversy about Senators was settled, we would have grave difficulties from time to time in our own body, and that the time of the Senate would be constantly employed in dealing with these disputed cases.

The case of Stockton took many weeks of debate. Then it was that Congress, the Senate waiving its objection to mingle the two houses of the State Legislature into a joint convention, doubting the power to do it, because it was then contended that the Legislature meant a vote of the two houses separately, still overruling that construction of the constitution of all the States of the Union, did pass the law of 1866, which provided that in case the two houses disagreed as to their choice they should, not as houses but as members of the two houses, meet in joint convention on the next day, and then by the vote of the majority a Senator should be promptly elected. From that time to this we have had no trouble in having these seats filled by all the States entitled to representation.

Now, why is not that a good example for the counting of the electoral vote? We meet not with full powers to count the electoral votes, not with the same power that the State assemblies have to elect a Senator, but only with the power conferred upon us to witness the counting of the vote. Therefore, if there must be some tribunal to decide disputes which may arise from time to time on the question of counting the electoral vote, why not, after we have tried by discussion and debate in the separate Houses to agree, meet together and vote there, representatives of States and representatives of the people on the same footing, vote for vote, and abide the result? That at least does furnish a decision. That provides a mode by which a controversy may be ended, because if you take a body of four hundred men it can scarcely be possible in the course of human events that these two bodies should be divided equally if merged together; while, if you require a separate vote in either House, more than half the time in all your political history the two Houses have differed in opinion, and therefore you would have an equal chance every four years either of the rejection of the votes of States by want of agreement or the admission of the votes of States by want of agreement. This plan does at least furnish a solution.

When this bill was sent to the House of Representatives last year they sent us a proposition called Mr. Eaton's bill. He had his views upon it very decidedly. It was a plan not like this, because there the two Houses were at once merged, and the votes of Senators and Members, I believe, were to be counted in alphabetical order upon every question without a division. That did not seem to be satisfactory; the Senate would not agree to it. I remember the committee of conference would not agree to that proposition. But it does seem to me that we would not lower our standard, that we would not lower our position as Senators, that we would not lower our position as representatives of States by going into a joint convention and there taking the vote by separate Houses, but let the result be determined by a majority of the aggregate assemblage then gathered together.

This might not create a different result. Suppose, however, that by a narrow vote of one in the House of Representatives they should declare that the vote of a certain State was not legal and should not be counted, and we here by a united vote, governed as we thought by the interests of the people of the United States, should declare that the vote ought to be counted; in that case, the very case provided for by the bill, a majority of the two Houses taken together would be in favor of counting the vote and carrying out the will of the people. While if the majority of one House, actuated by political motives, perhaps by the passions and contentions of the hour, should say no, the great State of New York or Pennsylvania or Ohio or even the smaller States in the Union would be excluded from this great college of electors by the arbitrary will of a majority of one House.

After a full study of all this question I am perfectly willing to adopt the principle of the act of 1866, to surrender my superiority as a Senator in legislation and go in with the Members of the House. After we have tried to agree in separate Houses and failed, I am willing to go with them and settle the question in dispute, whatever it may be. In this case we would at least secure a mode of decision that would probably be effective, and that in all time would not result in an even division of opinion. Then, according to the mandate of the Constitution, which is put in there without any ifs or ands, without any qualification, the vote shall then be counted. It would be done even if it was not satisfactory to us in the Senate.

Mr. President, these are my views, and with these opinions I intend to submit some amendments which in my judgment will carry them out, but if they are defective in detail I should be very glad indeed to have them referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or to my friend from Massachusetts who has charge of the bill, for any revision or criticism that he may make upon them. It is my idea that after all these proceedings in this bill have been gone through with the clause allowing either House to exclude a vote should be stricken out of the bill, and that there should be inserted in it a provision that when an agreement has failed between the two Houses they should then meet in joint convention, have the votes of each House counted, add the aggregate together, and let the majority decide.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, which has not been read at the desk but has been clearly stated, is——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to have the amendments sent up and read?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Never mind; we may treat them as sent up, and they can be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I will send them to the desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Ohio has stated with clearness his proposition. After the votes, as they are called, are opened and a disagreement arises between the two Houses in regard to what shall be done in identifying a vote (for that is all there is to it, because everybody agrees that whatever is the vote of a State must be counted, so that the action of both Houses, or either House, or any other tribunal, is to ascertain whether the paper presented is the vote of the State), that dispute existing, the proposition of the Senator from Ohio is that in case the Senate and the House of Representatives disagree in their constitutional and automatic capacity as the Government of the United States, there shall be a consolidated count of heads of the seventy-six Senators and the three hundred and twenty-five Representatives, as the numbers are now, and that the majority of all, per capita, shall determine the result. The Senator appears to have laid some stress upon the fact that that is only a last resort; that where after discussion and consideration in either House they have failed to come to an agreement, then in order to get some solution this is the best thing to do. If I were a mouse and had got to be eaten up by the cat at last, I should just as soon be swallowed to-day as to be undergoing a discussion in her claws for three or four days before I was swallowed. That is exactly this case. The Senate of the United States might just as well propose to the House of Representatives a bill which declares that in case of a disagreement between the two Houses in respect of the identification of a vote, then and there the judgment of the House of Representatives shall prevail and be done with it. That is all there is to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what the bill says now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon; that is not what the bill says now. The bill says now that in case either of these equals, one representing the sovereignty and purity and independence of the States, and the other representing the mass of the people of all the States without regard to State lines, disagree, in a certain event, nothing shall be done in respect of the particular point of disagreement. That is all it says.

My honorable friend has stated that the thing which has seduced him (if I may use such a phrase) into this remarkable proposition has been the analogy which he sees, the parallelism, between the act of Congress of 1866 providing for the election of Senators by the Legislatures of States and his proposition. With the greatest possible respect to my distinguished friend from Ohio I must disagree with him in that respect. There is in my judgment neither constitutional, nor political, nor moral parallelism in any respect between the act of Congress of 1866 and what is here proposed; and why? The government of a State is a unit; it is not complex. The division of its own powers within itself is only a partition of limitations and securities of private rights against hasty legislation. The composition of the Congress of the United States and the Government of the United States is not a unit. It is complex. It recognizes in large and important respects the importance of preserving the independent sovereignty and powers of each one of the States; and every letter and every line in the Constitution of the United States that refers to this complex autonomy separates it from being a unit into three several parts, neither of which can act without the consent of the two others except in the case of overriding the Presidential veto by two-thirds of all the States and two-thirds of all the people represented in the other House. There is the distinction.

There is, therefore, I repeat, with great respect, no possible analogy between the provision of the act of Congress that the Legislature of a State, its senate and its house of representatives, shall vote as a solid body in a certain event for a Senator of the United States, and the case of providing that it shall be determined who shall be the President of the United States under our Constitution by the consolidated vote of the members of the Senate and the members of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Do you not remember, Mr. President, does not every Senator remember, how carefully and how explicitly in the Constitution of our fathers, as it now stands, still undisturbed by amendment, unassailed by public opinion, are preserved the rights of States in every act that leads to and is consummated in the election of a President of the United States? First, the Constitution declares that the several States shall appoint their own electors of President, and nothing is left in all the other provisions of the Constitution in regard to that great act except the mere method of ascertaining what is the will of each State as a State in regard to who its choice shall be for the Chief Magistrate of this nation. Then when the occasion should happen, as our fathers saw it might, that there was a failure of any one candidate to receive a majority of all the electors of all the States put together, which was required to make a valid election, they provided that the House of Representatives, not voting in solido, not voting per capita, not voting with the members of the Senate, not voting concurrently with the Senate as a body, but voting by States, each delegation for its own State casting one vote and one only, should select the person who should discharge the executive functions for the next four years.

Yet in the face of all that, my honorable friend asks the Senate of the United States to provide that in case the question of the identification of an electoral vote is so doubtful and so difficult that the two Houses acting in their independent and constitutional character (named in the Constitution as the two Houses and not the members of the two Houses who are to participate in this great act of summing up the result) disagree, the representatives of the States shall be lost and dissolved in the representatives of the people, and that a per capita voice shall determine the result. I can not see that there is safety in that; I can not see that there is constitutional right in that; for whether the State be great or small, whether it be Ohio or Delaware, the necessity to the people of either and each and both of those States is just as great that their Statehood, their independence, in this act, as in every other under the Constitution, must be preserved intact and exclusive for itself, whether it be a great State or a small State.

But I did not expect this afternoon to go into a general discussion of this subject, and therefore I will leave the matter with what I have now said for the time being.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have but a very few words to say in reply to the Senator from Vermont, for whose opinion I have great respect. The first point and the only point that he makes in this case is that the Senate surrenders something of power. I deny it. The bill as it stands now gives to a majority of the House of Representatives the right to exclude the vote of any State where two returns have been made or even formulated on a paper purporting to be a return. The bill as it now stands gives the House of Representatives absolute power, per capita, without the vote of the Senate at all, overriding the vote of the Senate, to exclude the vote of any State where there are two returns.

If, therefore, there is any surrender of the power of the States it is in the bill as it stands, because it is not any answer to say that we have the same power to defeat the will of the people. We assume that the Senate of the United States would never do that, and it does not give us any advantage to say that we can do as much mischief as the House can do. If the House is bent on evil, to follow partisan designs and party ends, it has it now under the bill. Whatever may be our opinion in the case I put, where by a majority vote of one in the House of Representatives a State may be excluded and our united vote could not overtop that single vote of a single member, the House has the power to exclude the vote in any case.

The only other objection which occurs to me is that the Senator says this is an abandonment of State rights. Not at all. The States are equal, New York and Delaware, Pennsylvania and Florida, and that we all stand by as the basis of the organization of the Senate.

But does my proposition make any inequality of the States? Does not Florida have as many votes in that joint assembly as the State of New York? Does not Delaware vote equally with Pennsylvania? Where is the inequality of the States? It may be that the presence of the Senate disagreeing with the House, with its vote representing the States, might change the result which otherwise would be within the power of the House by party majority, by party votes, to overturn and override the will of the people and exclude States from their votes. They represent people; we represent States.

Therefore the proposition made by me gives the advantage to the smaller State, if there is any advantage, because when we go there in joint assembly the small States may have 3 votes for a population of 200,000, while the great States would have only 1 vote for 160,000, or whatever it may be. So the advantage is always with the smaller States, and my proposition does not disturb that advantage but gives them the benefit of it.

Nor do I see anything in the point made by the Senator that our Government is a complex government. So it is; but one of the essential properties of this Government has been to separate the powers of the great divisions of the Government—executive, legislative, and judicial. It was the intention of the framers of this Government to make the election of a President far removed from the Congress of the United States, and the only part Congress plays in it on the face of the Constitution is that the votes must be counted in the presence of the two Houses. The bill as it stands now not only gives Congress power by the two Houses to override the will of the people expressed through their electors, but it gives to either House upon a prepared case that can be made in any State the power to defeat the will of the people.

Now, sir, I do not want to see that power rest anywhere, and if it must rest somewhere I want it to rest with the largest body of representative men—who represent the honor, the property, the States, and the people of this great country. I should rather take the decision of a majority of four hundred men than the separate decisions of two bodies, one composed of seventy-five and the other of three hundred and twenty-five. In the one case there is a certainty of a decision, and that is more than anything else, because even a bad decision is better than no decision. No decision in the case of the election of a President may involve us in a civil war, which God forbid—we have had enough civil war for our generation or for all generations—while if there is a settlement of this question by the vote of a majority we know how cordially the people acquiesce in whatever is done according to law.

Senators, I have given to this subject my earnest consideration, certainly with no desire of a party advantage, and I have come to the conclusion that the safety of our country within a brief period of time may turn upon the mode in which we decide this question. I am willing to leave the decision of the controverted questions which come up in those stormy scenes, seven of which I have witnessed to the final resort, to be settled by the majority of the votes of the representatives of the people and the representatives of the States united in one general assembly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difficulty that the Senator from Ohio suggests, of not deciding in one case and deciding in the other, is an imaginary one. Under the bill as it now stands, or any other possible bill that regulates by law this process, the result is a decision conformable to the form of the law. It does not leave anything undecided. It only provides by law that whatever the two judges can not agree upon shall be followed by a result, that that paper shall not be treated as the authentic act of the State. Now, suppose you put it the other way, that would decide it equally well, that wherever they could not agree the paper should be treated as the authentic act of the State; and having reached that, as I said before, we have got to the end of the question, for the authentic act of the State having been ascertained, then the Constitution, superior to everybody and everything, declares what shall be the consequences of it, and that the man who gets the majority of all the votes of the electors of the States shall be the President. It does not leave anybody to decide anything, and that is just where the case stands. Therefore, when the Senator proposes that in the case of a disagreement between the two Houses of a complex government respecting distinct and separate rights and liberties, that shall be followed by leaving it to one of those two Houses (for that is what it is) to decide what shall become of the rights and liberties and securities in elections of the people, you have given away your case.

The Senator says: Why the House of Representatives may be influenced by a political bias and by 1 majority may declare that a vote shall not be counted or shall, because they may decide either way. Where is the Senate? May not the Senate be influenced by a similar bias and in a similar way? We are all alike. So we do not gain anything in the illumination of this result by saying that one body or the other body may be influenced by a bias, or by corruption, or by whatever.

Power must be reposed in every government somewhere. The fathers who built this Government reposed it, as it regards this matter and all others affecting the whole people of the United States, in three separate bodies, four in fact, the legislative in its two branches each acting independently of the other, the executive, and the judiciary. That was the system, and I repeat a thing to which my friend did not refer at all, that every step in this constitutional process of the election of a President is a step of States and nothing else. So when you declare that the States shall disappear in case of disagreement between their representatives and the representatives of the whole body of the people, and that seventy-six Senators shall be consolidated with three hundred and twenty-five Representatives, you might just as well in a case of party bias leave the Senate out altogether. Take it as it is now, 6 or 8 Republican majority, whatever it is—not being much of a politician I have not counted it up, but somewhere there—and the House of Representatives, as I believe, 40 or 50 Democratic majority. Now, suppose the case of this bias which is to operate at the other end of the Capitol in one way on a disputed vote and to operate at this end of the Capitol the other way. We are then consolidated. The voice of the Senate is lost except as to the 6 votes, or the 8 votes, or whatever it is. Suppose fifteen years ago, when the House of Representatives had a large Republican majority and there was the same party bias, then the result would be exactly reversed if bias is to have its influence. That is the case which my friend presents, and nothing else, that we are to get rid of the difficulties of either House acting by itself under a bias, and to accomplish that result, to obviate that bias, by putting the two biases together and letting the biggest bias manage the performance. That is the way it is.

We can not legislate in that way, sir. We must legislate upon the theory that in these two great departments of the legislative power of the Government, and of all its power so far as regards carrying on a government, year in and year out and in the long time to come the States and the people will have such representation as on the whole will be a representation of justice and of the truth; and when you undertake to legislate in view of the idea that one party or the other is to be carried away by a bias you are legislating for a contingency of affairs that no human contrivance can provide for. You have only put together the opposing influences of bias or of corruption, or whatever it may be, and say that the largest amount of corrupt influence, if it were that, that can be got together in one solid body shall have its victory.

That, Mr. President, is not the theory of this Government. The theory of this Government, as the Constitution declares in this respect, is that the States shall choose their electors, that the votes of those States, as certified by the governors, as it respects the character and office of the persons who cast them, shall be counted, and that they shall be counted not in the presence of the members of the two Houses, not to be acted upon by the members of the two Houses, as such, as one body, but in the presence of the Senate of the United States and in the presence of the House of Representatives of the United States; and when there is a failure of the character described in the Constitution, then the members of the House of Representatives, each State acting through its own delegation as one single unit of power, shall choose the President. Now, into the face of that is thrown the proposition that the States and the representatives of the people shall be poured into one mass and melted together, and that every disagreement—and there would always be one in such a case where there was a possibility of raising it—shall be left to that solid body to decide. I can not see either the constitutional propriety or the wisdom of such a proposition.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, if we are to test the question now in debate by its influence in the determination of the election of a President, and if that determination is to be decided by one or two of the Houses of Congress, or by the two Houses of Congress together, it is worth while for us to see in what possible predicament this issue may be placed under the Constitution. If it be true that the only debate raised in behalf of the power of the Senate is against its being swallowed up in the numerical count of the two Houses—in other words, that its preference and its duty may be sacrificed by this numerical count—let us see how the disposition of the case is to present itself, and what the consequence is to be to the Senate's power, if there is a difference between the two Houses.

It is not worth our while to debate what may be the juncture when the rejection or the acceptance of the vote of any State will not affect the election. It is only in the critical condition when the rejection of the vote of a State or its acceptance will vary the result; and how can that arise? It never can arise from suppressing the vote of a State except in its depriving a candidate of a majority of the electors; otherwise it is ineffectual. You therefore must deduct from the triumphant candidate, if the State's vote is counted, enough to deprive him of the right of election, but you can not confer upon the competing candidate the superiority of votes to elect him. A candidate, to succeed, must have a majority of the electoral college. You can not increase the vote of the candidate who is to profit to a certain extent apparently by depriving his competitor of votes.

What, then, happens if you adopt the system that difference between the two Houses by negation of opinion shall suppress the vote of a State? Simply that that candidate whose vote is suppressed has not a majority; his competitor has no majority, and the Senate in numerical count is absolutely swallowed up by the House whenever it chooses to make a difference of opinion, for then by the House making a difference of opinion it prevents there being a majority for any candidate, and then the House is in possession of the election. There the method proposed by the Senator from Ohio at least gives an opportunity to have the Senate in its count with the House carry the day in a nice contest, when absolutely the Senate is suppressed entirely by the mere assertion of difference of opinion by the House. Thus by the difference raised as to the suppression of a vote, when the suppression of the vote takes the election away from a candidate who would have with it a majority, the House is at once the master of the election, and what can happen when the two Houses meet together and try conclusions in a numerical count except that the House carries it? That is, to reject the vote, and then be in possession of the election, which it was in possession of before there was any comparison.

I will agree that when the election of President would not depend upon whether a State's vote was to be rejected or accepted, it is a matter of interest and of importance that no such injustice or no such rashness of judgment should suppress a vote; but I submit that the only debate here, and that is the way it has only been urged, is that the vote of the Senate and its protective power in the election is lost by the count in the general ballot of the two Houses connected. I can not but perceive that the methods proposed by the Senator from Ohio give one opportunity to the Senate to overcome the majority in the House by the count of the united votes of the two bodies.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the amendments which I sent to the desk may be printed in the RECORD. It is hardly worth while to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order to print will be made if there is no objection.

The amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. SHERMAN are as follows:

In section 4, lines 37 to 39, strike out the words:

And no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative votes of both Houses.

In same section, lines 51 and 52, strike out the words "acting separately" and the word "concurrently" and insert "as hereinbefore provided" before the word "shall."

In same section, lines 57 to 60, strike out the words:

Then those votes, and those only, shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide to be the lawful votes of the legally appointed electors of such State.

And insert the following in lieu thereof:

Then upon the reading of such returns or papers purporting to be a return from such State, the same proceedings shall be had as are prescribed in the preceding section.

In same section, line 62, after the words "decision of the," insert "two Houses on the."

In lieu of section 5 insert:

SEC. 5. If it shall appear from the action of the two Houses that they disagree upon any question submitted to them under the provisions of the preceding section, then the members of the two Houses, in joint convention, shall immediately, without debate, upon the roll-call of the respective Houses, vote upon the question or questions upon which there has been such a disagreement, and the decision of the majority of the members of the joint convention present shall be deemed final and conclusive, and the vote shall be counted accordingly and be announced by the President of the Senate.

That while the two Houses shall be in meeting as provided in this act the President of the Senate shall have power to preserve order; and no debate shall be allowed and no question shall be put by the presiding officer except to either House on a motion to withdraw, or upon questions upon which the two Houses have disagreed as aforesaid.

Mr. MORGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the consent of my friend from Alabama——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who desires to explain a point in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon.

Mr. HOAR. I do not desire to enter into the debate at this time, for I am not sure that the condition of my voice will allow me to be heard, but it seems to me that the remarks of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] are based, I will not say upon a misapprehension in regard to so eminent a constitutional authority as he, but upon a difference of opinion with the committee as to the effect of the bill. I understand his proposition is that if the vote of a State be rejected by the operation of the mechanism provided in the bill it will result as a subtraction of so many votes from the otherwise triumphant candidate in the case where it makes a difference in the election, but it will not result in an addition of those votes to the other candidate or in a diminution of the number of votes necessary for a choice, which must be a majority of the whole number of electors. As the committee understood that proposition, so far as I know, and I think I have a right to speak for them in that particular, they supposed that when there are two returns from a State and under the operation of the bill no return from a State is counted, that is not merely a subtraction of the votes from one side or the other of the two candidates, but it is a diminution of the whole number of electors found by that legal and constitutional process to be appointed. For instance, if three electors are certified to have been appointed from the State of Rhode Island by one return, and three different electors are certified to have been appointed by the State of Rhode Island by another return, if the two Houses differ and, thereupon, Rhode Island is not counted, it is no more counted in making up the number of electors appointed than it is counted for one or the other of the particular candidates. So, then, the proposition, as I understand it, of the Senator from New York proceeds from a difference of opinion on his part with the committee as to the effect of its bill.

Then he says that in that case, if it resulted in no choice after the count had been made in this way, the House would get possession of the question equally under the bill reported by the committee and under the method proposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio, and would proceed to elect; but the House as an electing body is quite a different thing from the House acting per capita under the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, because in one case it is to be an election by the House by States. For instance, there are to be but 38 votes cast for the Presidency in the existing condition of the Union, and under the process of the Senator from Ohio it is a body of four hundred persons and over, who are practically and in effect, though not in form, to elect the President of the United States.

Indeed, Mr. President, though I do not wish to discuss this question now, with all due respect to the honorable Senator from Ohio who has just addressed the Senate, it seems to me that his proposition to solve this grave constitutional difficulty is precisely Mr. Pickwick's advice to his followers how to behave when they came into a town where there was a mob. "Always shout with the mob," said Mr. Pickwick. "But," said Mr. Tupman, "Suppose there are two mobs?" "Then shout with the largest." [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, with the consent of my friend from Alabama who wishes to address the Senate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 21, 1886.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 21, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CLAIM OF S. F. RICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with accompanying papers, a letter from the Attorney-General relating to the claim of S. F. Rice for services in prosecuting certain deputy marshals; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SINKING FUND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an account of the investments of the sinking fund for the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, and recommending a modification of the provisions of the act of March 7, 1878, indicating the securities in which the fund shall be invested; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

BUILDING NO. 17, NORFOLK NAVY-YARD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Navy of an appropriation for altering and refitting building No. 17 at the Norfolk navy-yard; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DRAWBACK ON EXPORTED STILLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing letters from the First Comptroller and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue asking that section 10 of the act of March 1, 1879, be amended so as to provide for the payment of drawback of internal-revenue tax on exported stills as such claims accrue; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CHANNELS LEADING TO PENSACOLA, FLA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Light-House Board asking an appropriation of $17,250 for aids to navigation in the channels leading to Pensacola, Fla.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PROTESTS AND SUITS AGAINST CUSTOMS EXACTIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting communications from customs and law officers recommending a revision of the laws regulating protests, appeals, and suits by importers against the exactions of money as duties by collectors of customs; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were twice read and referred as indicated:

A bill (S. 209) for the relief of the legal representatives of John M. Robeson, deceased—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 241) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 311) for the relief of James Trabue, Thomas Thatcher, Michael Callahan, and the widow of John Waters—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 498) for the relief of George T. Dudley—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The Speaker proceeded to call the committees for reports to be placed upon the appropriate Calendars.

J. W. EWING.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Patents, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 830) to provide for extension of letters patent for improved medical compound to J. W. Ewing, assignee of M. R. Garsam, administrator of the estate of C. H. Mitchell, deceased; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE PUBLIC LAND COMMISSION.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 18) for the further distribution of the report of the Public Land Commission; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

The call of standing and select committees and of the commissions and committees authorized by statute to report to the House was continued and concluded, no further reports being presented.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS OF WIDOWS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour for the call of committees for the consideration of measures already reported now begins at 12 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m. The call rests with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] not being here, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] will take the chair temporarily.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of the widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] has forty-three minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have decided not to occupy more than a few minutes upon this proposition, and then, at the earnest request of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I will yield my time to him, as he desires to close this debate. During the few minutes I shall occupy I propose to speak generally on the question of pensioning soldiers and soldiers' widows. The question, who should receive pensions is one upon which there is perhaps more diversity of opinion than on any other question that has ever been before the Congress of the United States. For my own part I am in favor of giving the largest pensions that we are able to give. I do not belong to that party who would bankrupt the Government by pensions, however meritorious; but I am in favor of giving the highest pensions that we are able to give to those who have suffered in the service of their country, who have been permanently disabled for labor, many of them ruined physically. Persons of this class, and many such are not now drawing pensions, deserve pensions. To this deserving class I am in favor of giving the highest pensions that can be granted having due regard to the interests of the tax-payer. I am also in favor of giving to the widows and orphans of those who have lost their lives in the service of their country such pensions as will preserve them from a condition of dependence. I would vote for such pensions as these even at the risk of oppressing the tax-payer a little.

There is, as I have already said, great diversity of opinion on this subject. Some men have said that to pension the soldiers of our armies as they ought to be pensioned would bankrupt the Government; and I was glad of the suggestion made by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], that the Committee on Ways and Means might have to revise our present system of raising revenue.

Should we adopt the amendment proposed by my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] and give pensions to our soldiers from the date of their disability, without regard to when they may have made application, the amount paid for pensions will be greatly increased. But, sir, in my heart and soul I am favor of that view. While it may not be expedient—and the Committee on Invalid Pensions earnestly desire that there shall be no amendment on this subject to this bill—yet these pensions ought to be granted.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] indulge me in a question?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I understand the gentleman to say that he is in favor of the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will you vote for it?

Mr. WOLFORD. I will tell you all about that before I am done.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like a categorical answer.

Mr. WOLFORD. Well, I decline to give a "categorical answer," reserving to myself the right to answer in the way I please. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then allow me a further question. It has been said here that to tack this amendment on this bill puts the bill in peril. Now if there are enough men here like the gentleman from Kentucky and myself, who favor the amendment, to vote it up, is there not sufficient strength in the House to pass the bill as amended; or if the amendment be voted down, will not the bill be left to be voted on by the House untrammeled by the amendment? Why is it that the gentleman from Kentucky and those like him who agree with me as to the justice of this amendment are so suddenly seized with a panic? I will tell the gentleman frankly—I want to whisper just a word in his ear——

Mr. WOLFORD. You may speak it out. I want everybody to hear it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It was said to me during the last campaign in my State that the reason the bill in reference to the limitation to the payment of arrearages was not passed was because it was voted down by a Republican Senate. Now, I am going to give a Democratic House the opportunity of voting it up. Does the gentleman understand?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to ask my colleague a question if he will allow me.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Your colleague cannot yield, as he has not the floor. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. WOLFORD. I shall not be able to deliver the floor to my friend from Indiana as suggested unless I am permitted to proceed now. And I will answer—not categorically, but I will answer everything my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has put—but in my own way, Mr. Chairman, for I always reserve to myself that right. [Laughter.] I said I was in favor of giving to every soldier arrears from the date of his disability. In the last Congress I universally advocated that proposition and always voted for it. My recollection is that my distinguished friend who now questions me did not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, rose.

Mr. WOLFORD. I know what I am talking about. My recollection is that my distinguished friend did not. Time and again when some of the most important bills—they were, to be sure, private bills—when some of the most important bills to pension the meritorious widows of dead officers and dead soldiers were before this House I saw you then urging we should confine ourselves to a rule which the gentleman tried to make that arrears should not be given upon a particular bill. Then the gentleman said to me, "I will not vote for the bill, I will cut out these meritorious cases, I will cut out the widow of that distinguished soldier or of that distinguished officer because you have not made a general bill."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Ah!

Mr. WOLFORD. I thought then it was captious, and, if the gentleman from Indiana will pardon me, I think so now.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WOLFORD. I will answer your questions, not categorically, but I will answer them fully, and I hope to the satisfaction of this House as well as to yourself.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky does not yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from Kentucky does not intend to misrepresent me.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No, he does not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WOLFORD. I intend to talk in my own time, and to make my own speech without having your speeches put into it. [Laughter.] I prefer my own speech on this occasion. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky declines to yield.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I decline also to assist him in making his speech on this occasion.

Mr. WOLFORD. I decline the assistance. [Laughter.] I propose to make my own speech in my own way.

I said, sir, that I was for pensions going back to the time of disability. I am for that in every case. I am for it in every individual case, and the gentleman from Indiana who puts his categorical questions to me can not say that and tell the truth. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do say it. The gentleman said I could not say it. I do say it.

Mr. WOLFORD. In every individual case?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WOLFORD. You astonish me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will say, with the gentleman's permission, I had during the last Congress and have now a bill pending before the Pensions Committee proposing to give the benefit of the arrearages act in every individual case.

Mr. WOLFORD. In every individual case?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WOLFORD. Why you, to my certain knowledge, voted against it. [Laughter.] I have the question fairly before this House and I insist he is not the man to put categorical questions to me on such a question as this. And now, sir, I want to talk a little about that proposition which the gentleman from Indiana put to me. I admire him for his eloquence, and I admire him because he loves the soldier, but it does seem to me he never talks but he shows he loves his party better than he loves the soldier. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from Indiana says it has been thrown up to him that but for a Republican Senate the bill would have gone through. Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who entertained the hope that politics would not have come into a question of this character. It has no place here. On yesterday, in his speech, the gentleman from Indiana said that we had put into the Democratic platform a provision that that party was in favor of arrears of pension. Does the gentleman mean to say that he is going to stand with us upon these great principles of the Democratic party, the principles of equal rights to all and exclusive privileges to none? I sincerely hope so; let him come, we will welcome him. If you desire we will open wide the door for you on that platform. That is the platform of Democracy, and we ask you to accept it.

I stood on that at the canvass preceding the election, and I stand on that platform now; but, Mr. Chairman, I stand to-day upon a higher one even than that. I stand to-day upon the platform of the very best interests of my country, for the welfare of the soldier and for his widow. But I will receive with open hands the gentleman from Indiana whenever he sees proper to come into the Democratic fold upon our platform. That is Democratic doctrine, and I believe that in every part of the country the Democratic party and the Democratic majority on this floor will vote for arrears of pension when the question is properly presented. It is nothing but right that we should vote for it. Why is it, I would like to ask, that a soldier who did not rush up to ask for a pension immediately at the close of the war should be entirely cut off from all rights by the passage of such a limitation act?

My distinguished friend from Wisconsin, General BRAGG, in his criticisms on this bill yesterday, stated as one reason why he opposed it that the soldier had to be "reminded by a claim agent." Sir, I take issue with the distinguished gentleman there. It was not that the soldier had to be reminded; but, coming from the war as he did, finding a country covered with debt, poor and impoverished (although, thank God, the great development has since more than covered the effects of the war and has brought prosperity and plenty to our land)—but at the end of the war, I say, coming back as the soldier did, finding the country poor, with many debts and with many doubts in the minds of the best men of the country as to whether we should ever be able to meet the indebtedness—and there were many who believed that we could not—this same gallant soldier, who had in a thousand instances risked his life in the defense of his country, said to himself, "I will not in this depressed condition of affairs ask for a pension." But, Mr. Chairman, time goes on and the country has developed in prosperity and plenty under the blessings of Almighty God; and now, when the country is able to pay, these poor, broken-down old men, or the dependent families of those who have since died, come and ask this Government, rich and mighty as it is, to give this little pitiful pension. Now the soldier says, "I am ready and willing to receive the generosity of the country; I am ready to take that which the Government can so well afford to give me, and I have no hesitancy in asking for it when the country is able to pay."

I submit, therefore, whether the distinguished gentleman had the right to say that the soldier has to be reminded by a pension agent. In his heart all the time thousands of them in all parts of the country desired to be recognized by the Government. But they would not make their appeals when the country was poor, and I admire them, Mr. Chairman, for not having made the claim sooner. Instead of cutting them out altogether under a limitation act, I say they deserve credit for having withheld their claims so long.

But I want to talk a while more upon the views of my distinguished friend from Indiana.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But I understand you to indorse them.

Mr. WOLFORD. I indorse them, but I do not indorse the manner in which they come. I do not indorse the way you present them here. I am in favor of the proposition; but the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions tells me that they will in time have a bill to deal with that very question—perhaps your own bill. I have no objection to that bill, and if it comes up I will stand by you and vote for it, whether it comes from Democratic or Republican quarters. I will not ask what party is to be benefited by our indorsement of the soldier, but I will ask all men to unite in doing justice to these brave men. That is all upon that proposition. It would be no objection to this bill to have it incorporated upon it, but I would prefer not to hamper this bill and encumber it or endanger its passage. Let it stand upon its own merits, and let us pass another bill for the other purpose.

I remember, sir, in the last Congress that we agreed to what was in my judgment a most just and righteous bill, a bill to pension the Mexican veterans, and it passed the House by an overwhelming majority. But I remember that when that bill was amended, as it was amended by the Senate—and I did not object to the amendments myself, for every man in that Congress will bear me witness that I was willing to take the Senate amendments and all and voted for the bill and spoke for it as I did—but we all remember that a large majority here was in favor of it, and yet we never could get the necessary two-thirds to pass the bill, and the poor old veterans have not yet got their rights. Therefore I am willing to take a lesson from that experience, and pass this bill without any amendments which will endanger its passage. Let this bill stand alone. When the other comes up we can take action upon it, and I hope speedily. I am willing to join the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in support of that bill when it shall come up again.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that the same party in this House which voted for the Mexican pension bill when it was passed here voted it down when it came back from the Senate, amended as it was with its six amendments in favor of these old veterans?

Mr. WOLFORD. If that is true I do not know it. But I remember, sir, and I have a good memory upon that subject—I remember that some few Democrats voted against it—many of them for it. I remember that the man who brought it up, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], was a Democrat and stood by it; and I remember your humble servant—and I claim to be a Democrat—stood by it with all his might. And I remember a large number of Democrats voted for it. And I remember a few sore-footed Republicans that slipped in the contest. [Laughter.] But, sir, it was no party issue as to which party was to have the honor of the bill. It was a question, shall the veteran have the pension? And for that reason I say I am willing to take the advice of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and let this bill go alone.

Many of the criticisms of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] in relation to pensions and the pension law were eminently just, and I hope they will all be adopted one by one; for if there is anything I do desire more than anything else on the pension question it is the carrying out of the old Democratic doctrine of equal rights, so that every one of these soldiers shall be placed on an equal footing, that a a man who is totally disabled shall receive the same compensation whether his disability was received in one way or in another, provided it was received in his country's cause. And I go further, and say that I admire that old Democratic doctrine that, looking over all our wars, said, "We shall not inquire in what war a man was engaged, provided he served his country." Can the gentlemen on the other side say that—that we will not inquire whether it was in the war of 1812 or in the war with Mexico or in the war of the States; but did he serve his country; did he do his duty?

That is the Democratic view as to pensions. We want to put them all on an equality. But it is said all these cases are not reported in this bill. I know that. Yes, sir, I know—I have had sore experience on that subject—that the report of a committee has many followers in the House, and the House will vote to sustain the committee. My friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] in his zeal might endanger the bill, and any of you might in your zeal endanger the bill by putting on an amendment that would be an advantage in itself.

But all these propositions will come up, and in the very nature of the case must come up. The mind of the American people is intent on the question, What shall we do for our soldiers that defended us on the battlefield? Those propositions will come up and justice will be done. It may be delayed for a while, but I hope it will not be longer delayed than this Congress until every one of these cases will be settled.

I agree with my distinguished friend from Wisconsin that many amendments are necessary to the pension law; but I do not agree with him that because a young and fair and handsome lady, with patriotic feeling burning in her heart, admired the old soldier of 1812 who had marched to Canada or went from Boston to Lake Champlain, who followed his flag wherever it went and fought the battles of his country—I do not agree with the gentleman in attributing unworthy motives to the young lady who married such a veteran. Though he was wounded, she loved him. She loved him because of his patriotism. She had in her heart and her soul a great admiration for the American cause and for the American flag and for the American name and glory, and that gave her a foundation to begin with, to induce her to love the old man who had fought for his country. She did love him and married him and nursed him. And when he died will you tell her, "You can not have a pension, because you, a young and beautiful girl, might possibly have married the old man in order just to get a pension when he died." Do you believe it? That is not reasonable. She had higher motives. But even if it were so—if she did marry him to get a pension, and took care of him and soothed the last days of the old soldier so that he was allowed to go down to the grave in peace under the kind and tender hands and attentions of a lady such as no man can use—if she did all that, I say she deserves her pension anyhow, and I would feel all the stronger inducement to vote for it.

But I pass over this. I think I have answered categorically all the suggestions of my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], and I now want to pledge him on this floor. When these bills do come separate and alone will I find you, sir, standing for equal pensions? Will I find you standing for the pensions of every man and every lady that had a husband or a son who died for his country's cause? Will I find you standing for equal rights and equal privileges for all? I hope I will; and I hope I will no more hear gentlemen saying, "Oh, we want a general law."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Kentucky pause for a reply?

Mr. WOLFORD. The gentleman may reply if he desires to do so.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to say to the gentleman from Kentucky now, quietly and kindly, that as there are some two thousand persons who have pensions by special acts of Congress, if the two thousand and first comes in and asks Congress that under a special act arrearages shall go to him in advance of an act of Congress that shall put all who stand in his position upon terms of equality with him, I will vote against it.

Mr. PETTIBONE. So will I.

Mr. WOLFORD. Then, sir, I have the answer at last, and I have it as I expected to get it. You are not for the measure. In your heart and in your soul you do not want it. [Laughter.] That is one broad plank in the platform of the Democratic party that you do not indorse, although you talk about it. [Renewed laughter.] I see Republicans all around me who are for it, who will vote for it and will do all they can for it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether it is not a matter of fact that the Committee on Invalid Pensions have always uniformly opposed the granting of arrearages in special pension bills? Is not that their rule?

Mr. WOLFORD. I believe it is, sir, and I am sorry for it, just as sorry as I was to see the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] oppose it. You, sir [Mr. CUTCHEON], did not oppose it, and I give you credit for it. You took the view, which I believe to be the right one, that every bill should stand upon its own merits, and that Congress, this great body which is chosen to speak the sovereign will of this nation, is not bound by laws or rules, but has a sovereign right to do what it thinks just in every case that comes before it. That is the view that I took, and that is the view that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] took. [Laughter.] I will say, too, that I believe the Committee on Invalid Pensions went wrong upon this proposition; but they are right now. They have introduced here a bill that ought to pass.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am taking up too much of my time. I should not have done it but for the interruptions that have been made upon other questions; and I want to talk now upon the question of pensions generally.

I do not agree with the doctrine of some gentlemen upon that subject. I am not in favor of putting the widow of the gallant officer or private who served his country for long years, fought many battles, won many glorious victories, made for himself a name and a record, honorable and glorious in the history of his country—I am not in favor of putting the widow of that man upon an equality with the widow of one who did nothing remarkable, but was merely a soldier. That is contrary to the nature of things. The very order of Heaven is that he that doth much good shall receive much, and the very law of righteousness is that the reward shall be proportioned not to good intentions, but to righteous acts. For that reason, sir, we love General Washington preeminently among all the great men of our country, because he did more for his country than any other man. That is why his country revere him above all others. Upon that principle I am for making a distinction; and when you have put the general pension, as I believe in my heart you will, at $12 a month for all, that means the lower grade; and then, when a case of extraordinary service to the country comes up for consideration, I will vote to raise by special enactment the pension of that widow or that soldier.

I believe, sir, not only in the doctrine of invalid pensions, but I believe in the doctrine of service pensions. I believe the very highest point the pension question can rise to is that of a service pension. I remember from reading the history of my country that very soon after the Revolutionary war the question of pensions came up. There were no invalid pensions then; they were not talked of at that time; but there were service pensions voted for every man that had an honorable discharge, provided he could swear that he was not worth $100. But the people rose and frightened the men that had passed that law, and Congress very soon repealed it, and said that all should have pensions. The pension was very small, to be sure, because the country then was poor; but it was a pension which the soldier valued. "This," said he, "is an acknowledgment to me that I served my country in the hour of her danger and her trial. I love it, Oh, I love it better than if it came to me in any other shape!"

Again, after the war of 1812 the gallant soldiers who had done such service for their country were disbanded; the Congress of the United States came up and gave them a service pension. I think that was right. It made the soldier love his country more. Oh, how grand the soldier feels! Can you imagine an old soldier who has gone through troubles and trials and has met the enemy in many a bloody conflict undaunted—can you imagine how proud that man feels when his services are recognized by his country, when that country says to him in substantial shape, "We honor you; we give you this pension for merit, for your patriotic services!" Now, sir, I am in favor of that very thing. I hope no gentleman will be alarmed, but I am in favor of a service pension. I am in favor of pensioning every soldier of the Mexican war. Give him what you gave the Revolutionary soldier; give him what you give the soldier of the war of 1812; give him that, and he will be satisfied. Give him that acknowledgment that he followed his country's flag into a foreign country, that he went into the sickly climate of Mexico and fought and struggled through a series of unbroken successes unparalleled in the history of the world. Give him that, and he will bow his head in gratitude and say, "I love my country more than ever, because my country loves me and has recognized my services."

But what about the soldier of the late war—the soldier in "the war of the States?" What do I propose to do with him? Do not be alarmed, gentlemen; I am for giving him a service pension. Starting from the Revolution, and coming down through the war of 1812 and the Mexican war to the war of 1861, I am for giving in due time a pension to all who deserve it.

But you say; "We may bankrupt the Government." I am not alarmed about bankrupting the Government. The suggestion of my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that the Committee on Ways and Means might report a measure declaring that men of overgrown fortunes should by an income-tax provide for taking care of the soldier—that is a suggestion which I rely upon. I believe that committee, when the emergency comes, will do its duty, and that such a bill will be reported. I favor such a bill. I have no war to make against the bondholders as such. I thank God that there are men able and willing to hold bonds. I have no war to make against the rich in favor of the poor. I thank God when any man gets rich by proper means. But I do not thank God when he uses his riches to oppress his fellows. In my heart and soul I revolt against such use of wealth.

The great problem now to be solved by the American people is, can your soldiers be properly pensioned, and can the poor be maintained against the oppressions of the rich? Is there any disposition by oppression or fraud to grind the faces of the poor? Do men undertake to cast out the poor widow of the soldier of any war? Yes; right here in Washington the poor old mothers or the needy widows of men who died for their country are turned out of places where they might earn a living in order that these places may be given to those whose relatives never saw any service for the country; and this, too, in spite of a resolution of Congress that such places should be given to wounded soldiers and to those having claims upon the Government by reason of the sacrifices and sufferings of their relatives.

I am in favor of making, step by step, all these proper provisions in the way of pensions. I hope to live to see the day—I may not see it, for I am old and infirm, and perhaps will never be in the Congress of the United States again—but I hope to see the day, or if not, I hope my children will see the day, when every soldier that has honored his country's flag at home or abroad, on foreign or on native soil, on land or on sea, will be recognized by his Government and receive a pension.

Can we do all this? Can the poor be defended against the rich? Is it in the wisdom of Congress to deal with this question as it ought to be dealt with? I invite thinking men and statesmen to the front. Will you say that this great Republic, this union of republics, has not power to make proper provision for its soldiers, has not power to preserve the poor against every oppressive influence that may be brought to bear upon them? England to-day is solving the question, Shall Ireland be a nation; shall that downtrodden and oppressed people be liberated and exalted? And that question will be solved. An anxious world is looking on and with beating heart awaiting the result. But in this country our statesmen must solve the problem, What shall we do with our soldiers? How shall we provide for them in such a way as they deserve?

We are all familiar with that sound principle, "In time of peace prepare for war." Let your soldiers learn that whatever may happen they and those dependent upon them will be provided for. Let our policy on this subject of pensions become a permanent principle. Let the laws recognize it; let all the people recognize it. Let it be understood that our soldiers will be honored in this way, as they deserve. Such a policy is wise with reference to the possibility of future wars. If this country should be engaged in another war—which God forbid—then you will find coming from the South and from the North, from the East and from the West, a great host of soldiers rallying round the cause of their country because they love it. They will not falter in their step. As the armies tread the land, as the navies ride the sea, no soldier or sailor will falter, for every such defender of the country will feel that the banner of his country is over him and that country loves him. But if you do not put upon a permanent foundation this policy of pensions, I submit to you would not the soldier tremble as he marched? He might well say, "I love my country; I am ready to undergo every hardship and to die for it; but, merciful God! should I die, what is to become of my wife and my children?" Who could put away such a thought?

Let it never be said of the American Congress that they have left a doubt in the heart of the soldier as he follows the flag whether he and his family will be cared for by the country. Sir, victories have been gained on the battlefield; but this moral victory, this great statesmanlike victory, which would place your soldiers above the fear of want in the hour of danger, would be worth more than all the victories of war. It would be a civil triumph, a victory of statesmanship. I invite statesmen here to achieve that victory.

O, that I had the voice and the eloquence to reach the minds and the hearts of the American Congress; but I tell you, whether your hearts and minds are convinced or not, the people are convinced. The people are in advance of Congress. They feel in their heart of hearts——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the policy of pensioning soldiers who have been disabled in the military service of the country and thereby rendered unable to earn a livlihood and support their families, the policy of pensioning the widows of such soldiers who have lost their lives in the service—I mean those who were their widows at that time—is a just and beneficent policy. No one would more cheerfully than myself vote pensions for such soldiers and such widows. We have pension laws providing, it would seem, for all the conditions that appeal to public justice. And yet, notwithstanding these laws, notwithstanding the Pension Office is open to all entitled to pensions under the laws, we have a deluge of private bills for pensioning the soldiers of the war, or those who profess to be soldiers of the war, each session of Congress. And instead of the number diminishing it is constantly increasing.

And in acting on these cases in many instances we give extraordinary pensions, and sometimes under extraordinary circumstances. I remember either in the Forty-fourth or Forth-fifth Congress we passed a bill through this House to pension a soldier for patriotic services in the war. President Grant returned that bill to the House with his objection to its approval. He informed us—and I understood afterward it was known here, too—that this man had twice deserted the confederate army and come to the Federal Army, and twice deserted the Federal Army and gone to the confederate army. [Laughter.] He said, sir, such a law would be a premium to treachery.

Now, that is one case where we take up a man and give him a pension which no just man on earth would conceive he was entitled to. I do not propose to enumerate them all, but I do wish the American people could see the manner in which these private pension bills are passed here—a dozen or half-dozen of members meeting at night, cross-lifting for each other, and passing them by the dozen without regard to their merits.

But that is not particularly what I propose to speak on here briefly at this time. It seems here, Mr. Chairman, judging from the debates, judging from other occurrences, that it is not so much a contest for securing pensions to deserving persons as it is a contest for political supremacy; a bid for the votes of the American people; an appeal to see who will give the most money out of the Treasury for the soldier vote and its influence. I witnessed a scene on this floor——

Mr. FUNSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question: What right have you to impugn the motives of members on this floor in that manner?

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will take care of himself.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that I witnessed a scene on this floor in passing a bill giving arrearages of pension, I believe it was, when Democrats were urged to vote for it by Democrats because it would give them the soldier vote, as the Senate would defeat it anyhow; and Republicans were urged by Republicans to vote for it as it would get ahead of the Democrats for the soldier vote, and because the Senate would defeat it anyhow. It went through this House as any bill will go through this House that proposes a pension, and when it got to the Senate it went through that body with as great unanimity as it did through this.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had a friend in Congress a few years ago from the State of Kentucky who had in mind a proposition which he thought would settle all this trouble, satisfy all parties, adjust the political trouble. It proposed to pension everybody in the United States and give life-pay to retiring members of Congress. This, it seems to me, was a good bid. It seems when we are struggling for political power if I should make this bid I would go as far as anybody could go to benefit my party by pensioning everybody and giving life-pay to retiring members of Congress. [Laughter.]

But what is this to come to? No one can doubt, no one will doubt, that I am correct in saying instead of the supreme and sole motive being to secure justice to those who deserve a pension, a motive as strong as that, I would say stronger, is to bid for the soldiers' votes, and to pay the money of the tax-payers of this country as the price of political supremacy. We proceed here as if there were no tax-payers in this country. We proceed here as if there were a great fund of money collected together and we were engaged in its distribution. But, Mr. Chairman, there are millions of toilers in this land, poor, afflicted, with families to support, earning their bread from day to day by their sweat, who have to pay taxes for every appropriation which we make. And I assume to warn members that we may reach the point at which the public judgment will revolt against this outrage of giving the public money for political supremacy, of taxing the people's sweat and toil and giving away their money in this manner.

Who that listened to my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] yesterday, who that listened to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] this morning, who that listened to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], would not judge a struggle was going on here as to which party shall make the highest bid in the way of pensions to secure the soldiers' votes?

Who has ever known one of these bills come up for consideration who has not seen this same thing enacted and re-enacted here? I will repeat, sir, what I said before, that the soldiers who are disabled in war ought to be pensioned, and I will vote as cheerfully as any man for every reasonable and proper pension for them, and also that those who are the widows of such soldiers and were their wives when they were soldiers, or where the soldier lost his life in the public service, should be pensioned. No man will vote more cheerfully or readily than I a proper pension for such service; but I would drive the thousands who come here to these halls into the Pension Office to make there the proof required by law to enable them to secure their pensions. I would not allow them to come here upon ex parte statements to play upon political feelings and obtain pensions in the name or on account of those who have really rendered service to the country. There is not a man here who does not know, I presume, that there are numbers of men receiving pensions to-day, I think I may safely say thousands, who are not more entitled to it than I am.

Mr. FUNSTON. Who are they? Just give us the names.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman can make his speech when his time comes. I beg he will not interrupt me any more. Mr. Chairman, I come here as the representative of a portion of the American people. I come here to represent them, and I do not propose that members on this floor or elsewhere shall challenge my right to express my own convictions on great public questions. [Applause.]

I have said, I believe, all I desire to say to the House in reference to this bill. I do not expect to defeat the passage of it. I do not expect to defeat the passage of any bill, however great an outrage it may be upon common sense or upon common right or however great a wrong upon the real soldiers or the soldiers' widows. I say I do not expect to defeat it; but I do in the name of my constituents, in the name of the tax-payers of this country, protest against the universal and indiscriminate giving of pensions to all men and women who come and ask for them.

Mr. MATSON was recognized.

Mr. BRUMM. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. BRUMM. I wish to ask a courteous question; will the gentleman yield for it?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. Does the gentleman from Texas think that under any general law that has been passed granting pensions too much money has already been paid to the soldiers?

Mr. REAGAN. I have no doubt, as I have already said, that there are thousands of fraudulent pensions being paid to-day.

Mr. BRUMM. I am not speaking of individual cases, but I have reference now to general laws. Does the gentleman think that too much is being paid under the general laws?

Mr. REAGAN. I am not objecting to the general law. I have said, and I repeat it, that those who are entitled to pensions should have them.

Mr. BRUMM. I am speaking now of the aggregate amount of pensions granted by law, not of individual cases; but whether the gentleman thinks there is too much paid out for pensions under general laws?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes; I think there are some $50 a month pensions that are too high.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman does not understand my question.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if he will favor this increase of pensions to widows.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I intend to yield to my friend from Arkansas, and if permitted to do so I would like to yield to him.

Mr. MATSON. I understood that I had been recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Indiana under the impression that the gentleman from Texas had yielded the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I desired to yield to my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. DUNN. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana, reserving, if I am permitted to do so, the time yielded to me.

Mr. MATSON. My object was to move that the committee rise, and I make this statement as I do not want to take any advantage of the time which may have been yielded to gentlemen for the purpose of moving to close debate.

Mr. DUNN. What time is left now of the hour?

The CHAIRMAN. Only one or two minutes remain.

Mr. DUNN. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Can I yield to my friend to move that the committee rise, and reserve the time yielded to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman can yield for a special purpose; but if general debate shall be closed, then the gentleman would be cut off.

Mr. DUNN. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, it must be apparent to this House that this bill in its provisions has been sufficiently discussed; and therefore, as the whole subject-matter of pensions has been suggested by the discussion, and if that is to be considered by the House in this general debate there would be no end to the discussion, as all these various propositions may by amendment be discussed under the five-minute rule, I move that the committee now rise, the object being to limit the general debate on this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration House bill 545, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the time set apart under the rule for the consideration of bills under this call has expired. The gentleman from Indiana can make his motion, however, at any time when the House is about to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and pending that, that all general debate upon the pending bill, which as I understand is first on the Calendar, be limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to inquire if the motion made by the gentleman from Indiana be in order until the bill has been considered in Committee of the Whole. It has heretofore been considered in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. But the bill has been in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union all the time; and the House in order to reach it has always been compelled to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON. That is true; but as I understand it is not on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It has been on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, subject, like all other bills on the Calendar, to be called up during the morning hour by the committee reporting it. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that he moves that general debate upon the unfinished business in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union be limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. After the general debate is concluded I suppose, as in other cases, we will be permitted to indulge in the five-minute debate?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. This bill in Committee of the Whole occupies no different position from any other bill of like character. The first question is on the motion to limit general debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill which forms the unfinished business on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on this bill by order of the House has been limited to fifteen minutes. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DUNN. I had no thought of participating in this debate. I had supposed, when the bill was brought in by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the simple form in which it was presented, that it would be acted upon by the House without delay. And least of all did I imagine that it would be made a vehicle for carrying all other meritorious and worthy pension measures which might be in the minds of patriotic soldier-loving members of this House. I had no thought of offering an amendment to the bill, nor did I imagine any other member had. But seeing that it is to be made a species of omnibus, a sort of Santa Claus Christmas wagon, to be loaded up with a large mass of gifts for the soldiers and "their sisters, and their cousins, and their aunts," I naturally remembered that long-neglected and seemingly forgotten, but deserving class of soldiers who did more to earn pensions at the hands of this Government, gave more of a quid pro quo for pensions that were never given to them than any other soldiers ever have done in this country. I speak of the men who added to the public domain that vast reach of country from the Louisiana purchase to the Pacific Ocean—the men who rolled out the map of our country across the rock-ribbed mountains of the West and down to the far-distant shores of California, glittering with its gold and sparkling with its diamonds—the men who bore the flag of our country victoriously across the arid plains and under the burning suns of Mexico, and planted it upon the walls of the great city of the Montezumas.

I thought of these men, to whom justice has been so long denied, who seem to have been forgotten, and I now speak for them, and I send to the Clerk's desk a New Year's gift to put into Santa Claus's pension-wagon for the soldiers of the war with Mexico, the war of 1812, the second war of American emancipation from British domination, and for the soldiers who met in deadly struggle the savage red man in the deep haunts of his forest home, gave peace and security to the homes of the frontiersman. I ask the Clerk to read that amendment, which I intend to offer when amendments are in order, and I challenge the vote of this House in behalf of these worthy and most deserving old veterans, whose scars of battles are now forty years old.

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers, of the military and naval services of the United States who served sixty days in the war of 1846 and 1847 with Mexico, who served thirty days in the Creek war or disturbances of 1835 and 1836, or in the Florida war with the Seminoles from 1835 to 1842, or the Black Hawk war of 1832, and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said wars, although their term of service may have been less than sixty days, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men as were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $8 or more per month, nor to any person receiving a pension for less than $8 per month, except for the difference between the pension now received and $8 per month. Pensions under this act shall be at the rate of $8 per month, except as herein provided as to persons now receiving a pension for less than $8 per month. All pensions under this act shall be paid from and after the passage of this act for and during the natural lives of the persons entitled thereto.

SEC. 3. That before the name of any person shall be placed on the pension-roll under this act proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, of the right of the applicant to a pension; and any person who shall falsely and corruptly take any oath required under this act shall be deemed guilty of perjury; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the pension-roll the name of any person whenever it shall be made to appear by proof satisfactory to him that such name was put upon such roll through false and fradulent representations, and that such person is not entitled to a pension under this act. The loss of the certificate of discharge shall not deprive any person of the benefits of this act, but other evidence of service performed and of an honorable discharge may be deemed sufficient.

SEC. 4. That the provisions of sections 4745, 4746, 4747, 4748, 4766, 4785, and 4786 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby made a part of this act so far as the same are applicable; and no law or laws now in force which in any way conflict with the provisions of this act shall be applicable to the survivors of the wars above mentioned, or be so construed as to deprive them of the benefits of this act.

SEC. 5. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person while under the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DUNN. What time remains for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. DUNN. I yield to the chairman of Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Arkansas is not this amendment which is offered now pending as a substantive bill?

Mr. DUNN. It is not, so far as I am aware. I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think that it is.

Mr. DUNN. My amendment is a copy of a bill which was offered in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the point of order.

Mr. DUNN. The gentleman from Iowa is out of order. The amendment is not offered now as an amendment. I merely give notice that I will offer it at the proper time.

Mr. MATSON. The bill under the consideration of the House stands alone. No amendment has been offered as yet, and yet the discussion that has been had has pertained to almost everything else but the bill itself. There have been but two or three objections urged to this bill in the course of the general debate; two of them by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG], my distinguished friend who so gallantly and successfully and gloriously commanded the Iron Brigade of the Union Army during the last war. He says he is opposed to giving the widows of soldiers $12 instead of $8, because the soldier who is totally disabled gets only $8 a month.

I am sure that the gentleman misapprehends the provisions of the pension laws. There are three grades. There are three "total disabilities" provided for. The first is a total disability for the performance of hard manual labor, and for that the rate is $8 a month. The next is a total disability for the performance of any manual labor, and for that the rate is $24 a month. The highest grade is that condition of total helplessness which requires the aid and attendance of another person, and for that the pension is $50 a month. Then there are other grades for specific disabilities even higher than that; so that when the gentleman comes to compare the pensions paid to the soldiers with the pensions paid to the widows of private soldiers, he makes an unfortunate comparison and one that does not obtain against the widows, but, on the contrary, makes greatly in favor of an increase of their pension. The widow is left by the death of her husband without any support whatever. There is no longer any capacity left there for the performance of any manual labor. For a like degree of disability the private soldier receives $24 a month, and all we propose in this bill is to give the widow whose support is entirely gone just half that sum. Then the gentleman says that he is opposed to the bill because some young women marry old men—because there are counterfeit war-widows. He had as well say, in relation to a bill to provide for coining money, that he is opposed to it because somebody will counterfeit the money after it is coined. It is a very narrow view, Mr. Chairman, to take of the question of providing for those who are entitled to be provided for by the Government of the United States to pick out certain exceptional cases and oppose the law because in such cases the law is abused. There never was a law enacted, of general application relating to any subject whatever which was not more or less abused. It is no objection, therefore, to say that this law may be abused by individuals in isolated cases.

Then my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] says that he is opposed to this bill because there are some widows upon the rolls who ought not to be there. The same answer that I have attempted to make to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] applies to him. He raises his hands in horror and says: "Where will this thing end? What are we coming to?" Mr. Chairman, in all kindness to that gentleman, I want to say that he ought to have thought about that long ago. [Applause on the Republican side.] The widows of this country whose husbands lost their lives in defense of the flag are entitled to be provided for in a way that is commensurate with the dignity and ability of the Government of the United States [applause], and it does not lie in the mouth of any one, no matter where he has been or what he has been, to carp at small matters, and say that because of this little thing or that little thing this bill should be rejected. The great controlling question is, Is the bill right? That is the question. Do you favor it because it is right? When we come to talk about amendments I shall have something to say in relation to that subject. I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, that the very life of this bill, and the very life of any measure that is proposed in the way of pension legislation in this Congress, depends upon the proposition that the measure shall stand or fall upon its own merits, and I know there is no class of soldiers in this country—quarreling among themselves as they are, as we all know—there is no class of them that want to be pulled through Congress under the petticoats of these old women. They want the pensions of the women first increased, and the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic, among its very first propositions, recommends the increase of the widows' pension from $8 to $12 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] has expired. General debate upon this bill is now closed by order of the House. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE].

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Sir, I favor this bill because it is right, and I am glad that now, after the very eloquent and effusive and diffusive speech of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD], the House has come back to the cool consideration of what is really here and now before us. Here is a bill reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions which proposes to increase the pensions of soldiers' widows from $8 to $12 per month, and I opine, Mr. Chairman, that the sole question now before the House is simply this: Is this proposition right in itself? Believing every word of it to be right and just, I shall vote for the bill as it stands. But I go further, sir. I say that not only is this bill manifestly just, but the proposed amendment of my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] to strike out or remove the bar contained in the act which took effect on the 1st of July, 1880, by which arrearages are prevented from going back of that date or back of the date of the filing of the application, is also just and ought to be adopted. That law as it stands is all wrong; and in addition to this bill I favor the proposition to extend the benefits of the pension law to all the old soldiers who were really disabled in the service during the war of the rebellion. Those men should not be deprived of their accrued pensions, whether they met their disabilities in camp, in bivouac, or on the battlefield.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I know cases among my neighbors—and I have in my mind the case of a soldier whose good right hand was partially demolished by a musket-shot while he was poising his revolver in battle. That man to-day can not get his pension. I have asked him, "Why did you not make your application years ago?" And his answer was the answer that thousands of men would make to-day, "Because when the war closed I had a competence; because when the war closed I did not need $8 a month from the Government; but now my property has been swept away and I ask this pittance; there is my right hand to show what I have done for the country."

Now, I say it is absurd at this late day to cling to the idea which was embodied in the act which took effect in 1880. If the money is due to the soldier, give it to him. I am in favor of this proposed amendment. And, Mr. Chairman, I believe the right way to do a thing is to do it when you can. We can pass this bill with this righteous amendment this morning, if gentlemen will not abandon their honest sentiments on this floor.

Mr. Chairman, I was pained this morning to hear the reflection thrown upon my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], who was the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the Forty-seventh Congress. He had the courage to say that he was opposed to special pension legislation—opposed to voting special pensions; and he gave a reason for his position—because time so taken up might be better occupied in passing a general act which would do universal justice. I never yet learned that it was wise every time a person wants a pin to go to town and get a pin; it is wisest to buy a whole paper or a whole package at once. I do not believe it wise for us to entertain these private bills; for while we are occupying time in this way we are denying to hundreds the justice that is due them.

Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that the gentleman from Wisconsin——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SOWDEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted after the word "thereunder," at the end of section 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

That if any person shall receive any money, either directly or indirectly, for services actually rendered or alleged to have been rendered in the prosecution of any claim under this act, he or she shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $500, or undergo an imprisonment of not less than six months, or both, or either, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a point of order. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact——

Mr. REAGAN. I have risen to a question of order.

Mr. CANNON. But I rose before the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WELLBORN). The Chair will first hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. In stating my point of order I desire to call the attention of the Chair in the first place to the fact that this bill has not yet been read by sections for amendment; and secondly, when it is so read, I desire to offer an amendment to section 1, while the amendment of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] is to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is correct.

Mr. REAGAN. That is the point of order I was about to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposed that the bill was being read for amendment, and that amendments were being offered to the appropriate sections as read. The Clerk will now report the bill by sections for amendment.

The Clerk read the first section, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That from and after the passage of this act the rate of pension for widows, minor children, and dependent relatives now on the pension-roll, or hereafter to be placed on the pension-roll, and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $12 per month; and nothing herein shall be construed to affect the existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of sixteen years. And all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CANNON. I move to amend by inserting after the word "years," at the end of line 9 of section 1, the proviso which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That in considering the claims of dependent parents, the fact and cause of death, and the fact that the soldier left no widow or minor children having been shown, as required by law, it shall be necessary only to show by competent and sufficient evidence that such dependent parent is without other present means of support than his or her own manual labor or the contribution of others not legally bound for his or her support.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MATSON. My point is that there are other bills pending in the House which involve that proposition.

Mr. CANNON. If so, I am not aware of them.

Mr. MATSON. I am aware of them; and I think I can show the gentleman I am correct. I ask him whether this is not one of the propositions incorporated in a bill introduced by him recently?

Mr. CANNON. O, no, sir; not at all.

Mr. MATSON. I thought there was some proposition of that kind,

Mr. CANNON. On this point of order, if the Chair will allow me. I wish to say, first, that I do not think the amendment is subject to the point of order. It is designed, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] will observe, to perfect the bill, providing for that class of people, in substance, for whom he seeks to provide—dependent parents. Hence the proposition is not liable to the objection which has been made to other amendments. It is offered in good faith; it tends to perfect the bill; it is apt and germane and humane as well.

Mr. MATSON. I know the provision offered by the gentleman from Illinois as an amendment is the substance of a proposition of more than one bill or clause of a bill now pending in the House. Perhaps it would take some time to discover that fact, but I am quite sure of it. There are gentlemen within the sound of my voice who could say whether or not they have offered such bills. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] says he has a bill pending involving that proposition substantially.

Now, as to the gentleman directing me not to insist upon my point of order, I desire to make a few remarks generally on the matter and amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish the gentleman would refer to the rule he avails himself of in making his point of order.

Mr. MATSON. I can not just now.

Mr. ROGERS. It is to be found on page 261, section 4 of Rule XXI.

Mr. MATSON. In relation to all these points of order I will say that I do not intend to make them myself, although they may be made by others. I am satisfied, as I have stated in the general debate on this bill, it is not possible to pass any pension bill of any kind if it is loaded down with amendments. That has been tried before. The right thing to do is to let each proposition stand on its own merits. We come here with a single proposition and ask the House to adopt it. We oppose amendments to it. I will promise the gentleman from Illinois the amendment he offers will be reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions at an early day, so the House will have an opportunity to vote on that as well as upon other propositions of a similar character. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman propose to put through this single proposition?

Mr. MATSON. That is the way we propose to put it through.

Mr. CANNON. Is it the intention of the committee also to put through as a single proposition the amendment I have offered?

Mr. MATSON. It is.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. MATSON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds the point of order is well taken, and sustains it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1 add the following:
"Provided, This act shall apply only to widows who were married prior to its passage."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to remark, Mr. Chairman, only this: This is an amendment which certainly is legitimate. I think it is right in itself and ought to be adopted to perfect the bill. There is certainly a difference between the rights of a widow who gave her husband to the service and who was killed in battle or contracted disability from which he afterward died and the rights of a widow who shall marry hereafter. There is a broad difference between the two cases, and one which I think will be recognized by every one upon the floor. It is because of that broad difference between the two cases I have offered the amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. I desire to reply. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Invalid Pensions offers to the House a bill which can be passed. It has offered one which will meet a grave exigency in this Government so far as the treatment of soldiers' widows and minor children of deceased soldiers are concerned. It is within our power now to pass this bill. It will go beyond our power to do any good whatever if we propose amendment after amendment to the bill and ask this House to consider and pass them. We will get a bill which will embrace all classes of soldiers, which will reach out in the domain of gratuity and generosity which this bill does not embrace. I hope the real friends of the widows of the soldiers of this country and their minor children, to whom we propose to do this service will stand up here as a solid phalanx and vote down every proposition offered as an amendment to this bill.

The amendment proposed by the able gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] is right, and I am in favor of it. The amendment submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is right and proper, and I am in favor of it. Many other amendments may be offered here which will receive the concurrence and approbation of the House and the approval of the people of the country, but we would imperil this one proposition which should pass here by these various amendments. The true test in my opinion of an earnest and sincere desire to do a service at this time will be to stand by the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and oppose every amendment which may be submitted to it. I hope therefore the pending amendment will be rejected.

Mr. REAGAN. I had intended, Mr. Chairman, to offer the amendment made by the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. REAGAN. I move, then, to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. Perhaps I had better ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], the chairman of the committee which reported this bill, whether or not I have the privilege of addressing the House on this bill in the discharge of my duties as a Representative of the people without being considered as guilty of personal offense.

The Constitution and the laws of the country and the partiality of my fellow-citizens sent me here, and I did not come to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana or any other gentlemen whether I had the privilege of debating public qustions upon the floor of this House.

Mr. MATSON. Do you desire an answer?

Mr. REAGAN. I think the gentleman had better not have said so much as he did at first.

Mr. MATSON. Do you wish an answer?

Mr. REAGAN. Not in my time.

Mr. Chairman, under this bill as it stands in ten years from now, or twenty years from now, a soldier may marry, if he lives that long. When he dies his widow then goes on the pension-roll. Thirty years after the war is over, forty years, if he lives that long, he may marry, and the widow is entitled to a pension for fifteen or twenty years longer. If she lives to eighty years of age, all the years of her life this pension goes to her because she married a man twenty, thirty, or forty years after he performed the service which rendered him entitled to a pension. Is that right?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Texas in this connection that there are now on the pension-roll something like eighteen thousand names of widows of the soldiers of the war of 1812, while there are only some three to five hundred soldiers of that war on the roll. Fifty years from now, under the provisions of this bill, how many thousands of pensioners will be on the pension-roll is a calculation that human foresight can not undertake to make.

Mr. REAGAN. I only desired to emphasize the point which has been made so well by the gentleman from Ohio and to support the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in the fourth line, the words "minor children."

I had hoped that this bill, so fair and just in its provisions, demanded as it is by an enlightened public sentiment and receiving the hearty approval of every true soldier in the country, would pass this House without opposition. The present law was enacted more than half a century ago, when the country was poor; when they were able to do but scanty justice to its brave defenders; when the cost of living was much less and the purchasing power of money much greater than it now is and when the prices paid for labor were far less. The widow's pension was fixed at its present rate because that was the compensation the soldier received while in the military service, and it was considered but just and right that when he had given his life to his country his family should still receive his monthly wages. Amid all the changes that have been made in our pension laws, increasing the rates for given disabilities from time to time, with the increased cost of living and the rapid advance in the price of labor, with the diminishing power of money to supply the necessaries of life, this rate has remained unchanged.

The time has now come when simple justice to a large class which suffered more from the effects of the late war than any other demands that this increase should be made. I can conceive of no greater sacrifice that a woman can make for her country than to give him whom she has chosen to be her life companion, him who is the father of her children, her pride and her support; and for this sacrifice she has received the pitiful sum of $8 per month. The soldier who was slightly injured received an equal sum, and the one who returned from the war with the loss of an arm received three times as much. As an illustration of this unjust discrimination let us suppose that from some Northern village two men, neighbors, left their homes at their country's call to maintain the integrity of the Government and to preserve it from the threatening danger of dissolution. Their circumstances were the same; each had a humble home, a loving wife, and two or three young children. The one returned to that home maimed and crippled by the loss of a limb but still strong and vigorous, with the prospect of a long life before him, spared to return to his family to protect them and to aid them in the battle of life—spared to cheer and comfort that wife and to watch over those children and direct and assist in their education. The Government allows him $24 per month to aid him in supporting his family and educating his children. The other never returns; that young wife never again looks upon the face of her husband. He falls upon the battlefield; and she is a widow, and those children are fatherless. He is hurriedly buried in some unknown field, and she has not the poor consolation of watering with her tears the flowers that grow upon his grave. Single-handed she must fight the battle of life; alone and unaided, except by the scanty pittance that the Government pays her, she must feed, clothe, and educate that little family. Is this just? Is a limb more valuable than a life? I envy neither the head nor the heart of any man who would deny to this suffering class this small increase so justly due them and for which they have so long waited.

I agree most heartily with the gentleman from Wisconsin that our pension laws are imperfect and full of unjust discriminations, and I concur with him in his statement that there should be a revision of these laws; that they should be made to harmonize, so that all justly entitled to their benefits should share alike in proportion to their disabilities; and I have great confidence that the Committee on Invalid Pensions, under the direction of its able and efficient chairman, could prepare a revision which would remove the many objectionable and inconsistent features of the present laws and which would embrace the more reasonable additions demanded by the soldiers of the country; but I have no faith that this Congress would adopt such a revision, nor do I believe it wise to refuse to grant the aid so justly provided by this bill because we can not get all that we would like to have. Half a loaf is much better than no bread at all; and if we can not build a new house such as we would like, it is far better to put needed additions to the old one.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Indiana offered the amendment that he did, not that I object to its provisions. I am heartily and earnestly in favor of the repeal of the limitation in the arrears of pensions act. I did all in my power to secure its passage during the last session. I believe the limitation was an unjust and unwarranted discrimination. I believe that those who marched side by side through the swamps and over the dusty roads of the South, those who fought side by side in the same battles, who received the same wounds, endured the same sufferings, and who languished together in the same Andersonville hells, should be placed side by side on the same pension-roll; but a bill for that purpose is now under consideration in the committee, and I doubt not will be speedily reported and can be considered upon its own merits. Our experience in the past has taught us that no general bill embracing a large number of amendments to the present laws is likely to pass. Each proposition should be considered by itself.

There are now pending before the committee a large number of bills for the benefit of particular classes of cases. If this amendment is to be considered in connection with this bill, the friends of the bill proposing to increase the pension for the loss of an eye or for total deafness, or those who think telegraph operators of the late war should have a military standing and pension, or those who believe that all disabled soldiers should be pensioned, or those who demand that all prisoners of war should be included, may with equal propriety urge their amendments. The effect of this amendment or any of the others I have named will be to jeopardize the bill. This bill passed the Senate at its last session and a large majority of the last House desired its passage, but under the rules it could not be reached. I appeal to the members of this side of the House to stand by the bill as it is and secure its early passage. There is not a village in the North but what has some poor widow whose husband gave his life to his country who is toiling and struggling to keep the wolf from the door. On the distant prairies of the grand young Commonwealth that I in part represent hundreds of soldiers' widows are living in poor sod houses or rude dug-outs, scantily protected from the terrible storms that sweep over those vast plains, struggling to maintain themselves while they take advantage of the generous provisions of that law which gives them a homestead if they will live upon it. To all of these the passage of this bill will come as a benediction.

Mr. PERKINS took the floor and yielded his time to Mr. MORRILL, who then resumed and concluded his remarks as above.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of supporting the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, which seems to me to be most eminently proper as a provision to be added to this bill if the bill is itself to become a law.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion of the question now under consideration, and I heard on yesterday the gentleman from Wisconsin, General BRAGG, present with his usual clearness and terseness some very strong objections to its provisions. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] tells us that of the pensioners of the war of 1812, while there are about eighteen thousand widows upon the roll, there are less than five hundred names of persons who participated in that war. Will some man who advocates this bill, will some gentleman posted in pension matters that are affected by it, do the House the justice to state some principle upon which you can give the man who does the suffering only $8 a month for his service and give those who come after him $12 a month? I can not see the propriety of it. I have listened in vain for some utterances that would justify the discrimination. Now, if the bill becomes a law, what a spectacle is presented here! The three hundred old veterans who suffered in the war of 1812, who did the marching and the fighting, who spilt their blood and endured fatigue, endured all the trials and troubles incident to that warfare, will go on during the rest of their lives drawing $8 a month pension, while the widow that was married to his deceased comrade forty years ago, and who possibly lived with him but a very short time, gets $12 a month. This is an injustice against which the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio provides. It is an injustice that cries aloud for a remedy. We will do ourselves and our constituencies injustice if we fail to remedy it. The woman has made some sacrifice who encouraged her husband to go to the war and was thereby deprived of the comfort of his society and the help of his hand in the struggle of life. But what commensurate sacrifice has she made who did not marry the soldier till years after the war closed? And let me repeat the question, what sacrifice has she made that has placed her on a higher plane of merit than the soldier himself stands on?

Mr. Chairman, I have but little hope that my views, or any other man's upon this floor, can materially affect the passage of any pension bill. We saw the arrearages bill come forward here with a carefully prepared statement that it would drain the Treasury to the extent of about $20,000,000. It has come nearer, or will come nearer before we are done with it, to twenty times $20,000,000. It has seemed to me that if you bring into the House of Representatives any pension bill it will pass. I have as much respect for the members as any man can have; I have respect for their integrity, for their ability, for their disinterestedness of purpose in the main, but I have never yet seen the House brought to a vote on any question of pensions, on a yea-and-nay vote, when the bill failed to pass. If this bill carried instead of a hundred thousand pensioners a million of pensioners, when it comes to the record the result will be the same.

But I wish to enter my protest against the injustice against which the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] provides, and to give thus briefly my reasons for it. And I would be glad to hear some gentleman state a reason why the man who is now suffering from his disability should get less pension than the widow who married a soldier forty years after the campaign ended. I believe in granting pensions to those who lose life or health in their country's military service, but I would not go about it by methods so flagrantly unjust to him who did the fighting and now survives as I conceive this bill to be.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. While I shall vote for this bill in its present condition if I can not do any better, I am not in favor of it as it now stands. I very much regret that any man who pretends to be a friend of the soldier upon this floor should say he is opposed to any amendment to the bill, because if we can pass an amendment we are certainly able to pass the bill. I do not believe it is right or proper to distinguish between the widow of the man who fell upon the battlefield and the widow of the man who got the seeds of disease while serving his country and died from the effects of the disease so contracted simply because the widow is unable to prove that he died from disease contracted in the Army. I do not believe that distinction is right. And I do not believe the principle is right, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] seeks to ingraft in the bill, that it shall apply only to those who are married now; that if a man who is entitled to a pension marries after this bill passes his widow should not be entitled to draw a pension under this bill.

One word more. We hear gentlemen upon this floor counting what this is to cost. It is right in a matter of this kind that we should look to but one thing and ask what is right and count the cost afterward. It would have been well in 1861, when gentlemen fired upon the flag of their country, to have stopped then and counted what it would cost to pension the maimed men of this country, instead of stopping to count the cost now when it comes to doing justice to the men who saved the life of the nation.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Two amendments are now pending which must first be disposed of. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, which the Clerk will again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "years," in line 9, insert:

"Provided, That this act shall apply only to widows who were married prior to its passage."

Mr. MATSON. I ask that the section be read as it will be if thus amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the rate of pension for widows, minor children, and dependent relatives now on the pension-roll, or hereafter to be placed on the pension-roll, and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $12 per month; and nothing herein shall be construed to affect the existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of sixteen years: Provided, That this act shall apply only to widows who were married prior to its passage. And all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to know if a substitute for the amendment is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that if any invalid pensioner, pensioned for a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in the line of duty, has died, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow, or minor children under sixteen years of age, or both, at the date of the death of such pensioner, such widow or minor children shall be entitled, in the order of succession named, to an original pension in their own right, under existing law, without being required to prove that the death of such pensioner was due to his military or naval service of the United States.

Mr. MATSON. I make the point of order that there is a bill pending providing substantially the same thing as is provided in that substitute; I know not but it may be in precisely the same language.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to be heard on the point of order, but I will yield first to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. This question may be as well settled now, as it will probably occur frequently before we conclude the consideration of this bill. Clause 4 of Rule XXI, on page 251 of the Digest, reads as follows:

No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

Now, I believe it is insisted by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that if the amendment offered is a provision incorporated in some other bill in connection with other provisions it is obnoxious to the rule. For instance, there is a bill pending before the House containing ten sections, one of these being identical with the propositions of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. I say he may offer it as an amendment to another bill. It is not the substance of any other bill pending before the House, but it is an isolated provision taken out of or among others in a bill and is certainly not obnoxious to the rule.

I make this statement because I will offer an amendment, perhaps, that is part of a long bill of many sections. I insist that an amendment to be obnoxious to the rule must be the substance of a bill taking the bill in its entirety.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had concurred in the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 671) making appropriations for the purchase of the old Produce Exchange building and the site bounded by Whitehall, Pearl, Moore, and Water streets, New York city, for Army purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, for printing 15,000 additional copies of the report of the Senate Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, together with the testimony; 5,000 for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

PENSIONS OF WIDOWS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Indiana on my left [Mr. MATSON] anticipated one of the questions I intended to discuss in asserting that this amendment is obnoxious to a point of order. In the first place, the amendment I have offered is not the substance of a bill or resolution pending. As was stated by the gentleman from Indiana on my right [Mr. BROWNE] there is a bill pending containing some ten provisions; and this amendment may be in substance identical with one of the provisions in that bill. I am willing to confess, and frankly do so, that this amendment is identical with one of the provisions in a bill which I have introduced myself and which is now pending before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but it does not embrace or include the substance of that bill; it includes only one provision of the bill—a part of the substance of the bill; and it can not be contended or maintained here that in the language of the rule it contains "the substance" of the bill.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly.

Mr. BAYNE. If the gentleman's argument be correct, can you not add one provision after another by way of amendment and thus get your whole bill in by indirection when you could not get it in directly?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is a question that I am not called upon to answer now. It may arise as a proper question when the whole substance of a pending bill has been injected, or is sought to be injected, into another bill. What I hold now, sir, is that under the language of the rule this amendment does not fall within the operation of the point of order unless it contains the substance of a pending bill. What does that mean? It means, of course, if it means anything, the whole substance of a pending bill, not merely a part of the substance of a pending bill, which I frankly confess this amendment is. I insist, therefore, that the amendment does not fall within the fourth clause of Rule XXI, and is not obnoxious to the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. Just one word, Mr. Chairman. There is a rule of law that you can not do that indirectly which the law prohibits you from doing directly, and if you apply that principle to the question now at bar, it cuts off this amendment clearly and unequivocally. At the last session, if my memory serves me, this question was raised and decided either by the Speaker or the presiding chairman at that time in accordance with the principle I have just announced; for, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] has well said, if you could by this method introduce one section of a bill as an amendment, upon the theory that it did not embrace the substance of the whole bill, then you might take up section after section, and thus indirectly incorporate the whole bill as a series of amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] be kind enough to cite the decisions to which he refers?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have just at this moment turned to the new Digest, with which I am not at all familiar, and have not been able to find the rulings; under the circumstances I could scarcely be expected to cite from memory the particulars of any ruling without some reflection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What I desire is that the gentleman will cite any decision where the chairman of the Committee of the Whole or the Speaker of the House has ever held that you can not embrace in an amendment the substance of a part of another bill. I wish to be referred to the name of a gentleman who made the ruling and the circumstances under which it was made; for certainly such a ruling ought to have made an impression upon the gentleman's mind.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am reminded by a gentleman on my right that Mr. WELLBORN so held this morning. I was not aware of that, however, and I now repeat that I am not familiar with the new Digest, only in print a few days, and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] should not expect me to state from memory every transaction that took place in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I supposed, Mr. Chairman, that so remarkable a ruling would have made such an impression on the gentleman's mind as to have enabled him to refer to it without the aid of the Digest.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, the remarkableness of a ruling depends very much upon the person who is considering it. Many things may appear very remarkable to one who never heard of them that are perfectly familiar to others. It would appear from the gentleman's position here that he forgets the rule of law which I have just stated, that you are not allowed to do indirectly that which the law prohibits you from doing directly; yet that is a rule with which everybody is familiar.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Does the gentleman undertake to apply that rule of law to this case?

Mr. ROGERS. It is a very sound rule, Mr. Chairman, and I should answer the gentleman's question in the affirmative and as a matter of general parliamentary law. Perhaps it is inapplicable to the case now made.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Arkansas permit me to direct his attention to a ruling which bears upon the question he is discussing?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. On page 271 of the new Digest he will find that Mr. Speaker CARLISLE ruled four times in the last Congress that "where an amendment proposed is one of the subjects or provisions of a pending bill it is not therefore obnoxious to clause 4 of Rule XXI."

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this point of order is not well taken. The argument that in this way we might accomplish by indirection what can not be done by direct means does not apply unless you assume that some one will offer every section of the bill referred to. Now, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], this point has been ruled upon at least four times in the last Congress. I hold in my hand the volume containing those rulings. One was made by Mr. Cox, who then presided over the Committee of the Whole, and another by the Speaker. I ask the Clerk to read the ruling of the Speaker in a case where this same point was made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McCoid moved the previous question on the said amendment;
Pending which,
Mr. Alexander made the point of order that the said amendment was not in order, for the reason that it was a section of the bill (H. R. 4814) submitted by Mr. McCoid as an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and ruled out on a point of order under clause 4 of Rule XXI.
After debate on the point of order,
The Speaker overruled the same on the ground, first, that the Chair could not possibly know in advance that Mr. McCoid intended to follow the proposed amendment by offering as substitutes for the various sections of the pending bill the several sections of the bill referred to by Mr. Alexander and ruled out on a point of order; and secondly, on the ground that it had not been shown to the Chair that the proposed amendment was the substance of the said bill (H. R. 4814).

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. EDEN). Upon the authority which has just been read the Chair overrules the point of order, this amendment being merely a part of a pending bill and not being the substance of that bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment because I esteem it meritorious and justifiable from every point of view. When a soldier has unfortunately incurred a disability which entitles him to a pension, it does seem to me nothing more than humane and just on the part of the Government that his widow and minor children should be provided with means sufficient to keep them from the poor-house.

I have heard a great deal of denunciation of the present liberal policy of pensioning soldiers. Some gentlemen in voting upon appropriations will "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." I have known gentlemen who would stand on this floor and insist upon an appropriation of nearly half a million dollars to buy an old building in New York, and yet refuse to grant a pension of $12 a month to the widow of some soldier who gave his health, yea, his life, to preserve the Government.

I am not afraid to announce now and here that I am one of those who believe in liberal appropriations for the soldier—not only the soldier of the late war, but the soldier of every war where citizens of the Republic have sustained the flag of our country. I believe in the policy of pensioning every soldier of every war that this country has ever been engaged in when the soldier has suffered disability by reason of his service for the Government; and when such a soldier has become old and unable to maintain himself, whether he incurred the disability in war or not, I feel it to be a duty resting upon us that we should at least keep him from the poor-house in his old age.

It was for this reason that I introduced into this House at the last session a bill pensioning all the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war, because I believed that the time had come when we should follow the precedents which had been established in reference to the soldiers of the Revolutionary war and the war of 1812. And, sir, when I believe that sufficient time has elapsed since the late war I shall be ready to put upon the pension-roll every man who defended the flag of his country in that war.

Mr. PETTIBONE. So will I.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In my judgment, no better use can be made of the surplus money in the Treasury than to distribute it among the people through the hands of our Army and Navy pensioners. The money you put into the pocket of the pensioner is not hoarded. It goes into circulation in every neighborhood and helps to increase the internal prosperity of the country.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Why is it not as proper now to pension the soldiers of the late war as it will be hereafter?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Perhaps it might be. That question is not now before me. I will go as far as any man here to pension the soldiers and do full justice to them. If the time has now arrived for putting upon the pension-list all who in the late war fought in behalf of the flag I am ready to do it. I would pension the veterans of the Black Hawk war—the war in which Lincoln was at first enlistment a private, and afterward, when his term expired, re-enlisted and became a captain. I would pension the soldiers of the Creek and Florida Indian wars, and I would pension now, as I have stated, every one of the soldiers that fought for the flag in the Mexican war, their widows and their minor children.

As I have stated, the money paid out of the Treasury to the pensioners does the country more good than any other money that goes out of the Treasury. It goes into circulation. Much of the large sums that you put into the pockets of contractors are hoarded up and to a considerable extent taken out of circulation; but as soon as the poor fellow who has borne his musket in the wars of the Republic receives a pittance of pension-money necessity drives him into the nearest store to pay his bill for the necessaries of life.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have the opportunity to vote for this bill. I shall be glad to have the opportunity to vote for nearly every amendment that has been offered to the bill; and if there is any amendment which more than another it will do my heart good to vote for it is the amendment of my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] extending pensions to the widows of deceased pensioners, without the necessity of proving that the pensioner died from the identical disability for which he was pensioned, meets also my hearty approval.

But, Mr. Chairman, we want first and foremost to secure this meritorious legislation in behalf of the widows of soldiers—to increase their pensions. It is a single issue, and it ought to be an untrammeled issue.

I do not envy the men who can stand up here and oppose increasing the pensions of widows from $8 to $12 a month. I do not know what estimate gentlemen can place upon the value of life, or what estimate such gentlemen can place on the value of the life of the husband to his wife, who will measure it at $96 a year and are opposed to increasing it to the pittance of $144 a year.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the very few moments of time I have I desire to refer to the language of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], and I am sorry I do not see him in his seat, because what I have to say will refer to him. Yes, I see he is here now. That gentleman in his language has seen fit to impugn the motives, to impugn the integrity, of every gentleman on this floor, on the one side or the other of this House, who votes to increase the pensions for the soldiers of the late war or for their widows or orphans. For one, I do not acknowledge the right and I never will concede the propriety of the gentleman from Texas or any other gentleman on this floor impugning my motives when I vote pensions for the widows of the men who fell in the crash and carnage of battle or for the orphan children they left behind them. The gentleman can look at the subject perhaps more impartially than we can; we never had an opportunity of looking at it from the outside as he has. [Laughter and applause.]

I do not come here, Mr. Chairman, to represent the ninth Congressional district of the State of Michigan to be lectured by the gentleman from Texas on that subject or on any other. So far as I have the privilege of a seat on this floor, in my integrity as a representative of the people of Michigan, I propose to vote for pensions whenever my conscience or my judgment deems it proper to vote for them without asking his permission or the permission of any other gentleman of this House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope now the gentleman feels better. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. In order to avoid confusion, the Chair will first take the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL], which was to strike out the words "minor children."

Mr. MATSON. I wish to explain the provisions of the bill so far as that is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MATSON. The words "minor children" apply only in case of the widow's death. When the widow dies, she at that time drawing a pension and leaving minor children under sixteen years of age, the pension is distributed among them, and that is the reason why the words "minor children" were inserted in the bill. It is expressly provided in another portion of the section that "nothing herein shall be construed to affect the existing laws of $2 per month for each child under the age of sixteen years."

Mr. MORRILL'S amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. TOWNSHEND'S amendment to the amendment, as follows:

And that if any invalid pensioner, pensioned for a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in the line of duty, has died, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow, or minor child under sixteen years of age, or both, at the date of the death of such pensioner, such widow and minor children shall be entitled, in the order of succession named, to an original pension in their own right, under existing laws, without being required to prove that the death of such pensioner was due to his military or naval service of the United States.

Mr. MATSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know where that comes in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is offered as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 95.

Mr. TOWNSHEND demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MATSON and Mr. TOWNSHEND were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 115.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, as follows:

Provided, That this act shall apply only to widows who were married prior to its passage.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 116.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. STEELE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 105, noes 126.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, a few words on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] to repeal the limit-of-arrears bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that that is not now pending. Does the gentleman move a pro forma amendment?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes; I move to strike out the last word. If gentlemen of the House feel as I do they will see that that amendment is eminently just.

Mr. SOWDEN. I rise to a point of order, and it is this: That amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is not pending before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair announced; but the gentleman submitted an amendment of his own, to strike out the last word, which is in order. The gentleman from Maine will proceed.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not understand, Mr. Chairman, if that amendment is a just one, as seems to have been generally conceded during the course of this discussion, why this is not the very best time in the world to pass it. The action of gentlemen in this respect seems to be a good deal like that of old Judge Stebbins, of Maine, at one time, who stated that he was thoroughly in favor of the prohibitory law, but that he was absolutely opposed to enforcing it. Gentlemen seem to be universally in favor of this proposition, but they seem to be opposed to passing it through this House.

There are, sir, three classes of men who are especially interested in this amendment. There is a class of men who did not, when the war closed, apply for pensions, because they were too proud to do so. The same spirit that sustained them in fighting upon the perilous edge of battle, that carried them to the front to defend their country's life, also inspired them when the war was over not to ask a pension at their country's hands. But many of these men have grown old; they have grown poor and helpless, and they find themselves absolutely in need of a pension to enable them to live. There is another class of men who were not in need of a pension or governmental aid at the time the war closed. They had what seemed to be a competence and made no application for a pension.

The same patriotism that inspired them to take up arms in support of their country also inspired them not to ask for a pension until the hour came when poverty and old age forced it upon them. There is another class yet who came out of the war when it was over with wounds and injuries which at the time did not entirely disable them. But time has developed the extent of the injury; old age has grown upon them, and they have become disqualified from earning a livelihood by manual labor. For these men I appeal to the House, and in their behalf ask you not to say that they shall not have their arrears of pensions because they were too modest or too proud or too patriotic to be among the first to rush to the Pension Office and apply for a pension when the war was over. I repeat, sir, I believe this amendment to be an eminently just one; and I do not know why this House, if it so believes, as indicated by this discussion, should not pass it now as well as at any other time. [Applause].

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HOLMES. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat surprised at the opposition that has appeared to this bill, as well as the reasons that have been given as the basis of such opposition. I do not understand that it is urged before this House that the bill is wrong in itself or unjust in any material respect. I do not understand it to be claimed that it is exceeding justice to the people who are to be the beneficiaries under it.

Objection is made largely on questions of expediency, and because it is to take money out of the Treasury of the United States it us urged that we should pause before passing such an act.

Mr. Chairman, when the soldiers of this country, whom these widows and dependent relatives represent, were called on to stand by the flag of the country, they did not stop to discuss questions of expediency; they did not stop to count the cost in money and blood. In my own opinion the only question presented in this bill is just this: Is this a just and proper measure? No matter what the cost may be. This country has not had occasion to go into bankruptcy or to appoint a receiver in order to compromise its indebtedness. It is not a question of cost on the part of the Government. It has granted munificent bequests over all this broad land for the improvement of our water ways, for the construction of railroad lines, and to carry out every substantial matter of internal improvement; and yet it should be remembered that it was only by the aid of these very men and their services in support of the flag of the country that we to-day stand under the Dome of this Capitol a united people.

I can not agree with my distinguished colleague from my own State who spoke so eloquently yesterday upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. I believe it is never the wrong time to do the right thing. We know how difficult it is to get pension bills before this House. We know how difficult it is to draw out from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, or rather a majority of that committee, a bill in aid of the soldiers of this country. I have been on that committee, and know how difficult it is. There are, I dare say, more bills introduced and referred to that committee that affect the pensions of the soldiers of the country than are referred to any other committee upon any other particular legislation; and yet what did we report to this House during the last term of Congress affecting this question? True, gentlemen say this subject is being used as capital to catch votes. Is it not true that the country itself then demands this measure? Is it not true that gentlemen are trying to stay behind and the sentiment of the country is advancing them forward? I am not prepared, sir, to sit here quietly and listen to the denunciations of gentlemen upon this floor of measures of this character; denunciations which they should not indulge in by reason of their antecedents or otherwise. I am not prepared to sit here quietly and hear my motives and the motives of other gentlemen denounced by gentlemen on the other side of the House and criticised as political trickery or demagogy when we ask the support of this House in behalf of our soldiers. While I differ with my distinguished colleague, I believe I am supported by the gentlemen of my delegation on this side of the House in the position I take, that this is the right thing to do and that this is the right time to give the soldiers who deserve well of their country this recognition, not only by their dependent relatives but the soldiers themselves, in the arrears provided for by this amendment.

Is it wrong? No. But, say gentlemen, it will take something out of the Treasury of the country. I am in favor of taking enough out of the Treasury to pay all our debts, this as well as others.

The widows and dependent relatives for whom provision is made in this bill are usually far advanced in years and unable by manual labor to support themselves or the families depending upon them, even to the extent the disabled soldier himself might have done were he living.

Besides, most of the avenues of life open to the male sex are debarred to women, and but a small proportion of the persons who would be beneficiaries under the provisions of this bill have resources for maintaining themselves except by their daily labor.

I know that there are thousands of these sitting by their scanty fires on the bleak prairies of the West who, deprived of their natural protectors by the call of their country, will bless this Congress if it shall perform this act of merited justice.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HANBACK. Upon yesterday the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] used this language:

> My reasons for opposing the proposition coming from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] may be briefly stated thus: No soldier who suffered a disability sufficient to entitle him to a pension at the hands of the Government failed to know it for twenty years after the war, or waited until he had to be spurred up by some claim agent in the city of Washington, who reminded him that he had been disabled for twenty years and ought to draw a pension for that time.

If the remarks made by the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin were hastily made I simply regret them, but if made with full knowledge of the power of the language he used I repudiate them in the name and behalf of the loyal soldiers of this country.

I live in a State where there are over one hundred thousand soldiers, white and black, from every State in this Union. I know men, hundreds and thousands of them, who were too proud in the earlier days to ask for a pension. I know men who never knew of the arrears-of-pensions act or of the limitation. They lived out upon the far prairies, bravely trying to fight out the great battle of life as they had bravely fought to a glorious conclusion under the flag of their country the battle for the preservation of that country's life. They had no means of knowing these things, and they rested upon what they supposed was their right at any time in the future.

In the name of those men out there and everywhere I denounce the statement which I have read. They were not required by a claim agent to let it be known they were disabled. They bore in themselves continually the shadow of the presence of death. Constantly they were reminded of a disability always existent and still existing. Because they did not know of the limitation, because they were too proud to ask for arrears, it comes with ill-grace now for any man whose name is upon the record of honorable service to his country to charge that these men who to-day are without pensions and who come under the provisions of this limitation have been prompted by the claim agents in Washington.

I am in favor of the bill as proposed by the committee; I am also in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. One reason why I am in favor of it is because the party I belong to said what I am about to read. This is what the Republican party said at its last national convention. I want to know whether the delegates there meant it or not, and I want to know whether that sentiment is to be voiced here by the representatives of that party to-day or not:

> The grateful thanks of the American people are due to the Union soldiers and sailors of the late war, and the Republican party stands pledged to suitable pensions for all who were disabled and for the widows and orphans of those who died in the war. The Republican party also pledges itself to the repeal of the limitation contained in the arrears act of 1879, so that all invalid soldiers shall share alike and their pensions begin with the date of disability and not with the date of application.

In the name and in behalf of the soldiers of this country who did their duty when their country was not worth a continental if they had not done so, I ask the House to do this act of justice to them and theirs. [Applause.]

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise, my purpose being to limit debate on the pending section.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana. As I understand there is no amendment at all now pending to this section. After the next section is read amendments will be offered, and it is probable I will offer one which will open a field for debate on this subject. I suggest that there is no necessity for rising in order to limit debate on the first section.

Mr. MATSON. If no other gentleman desires to speak on the first section I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. EVERHART. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] withdraw his motion?

Mr. MATSON. I do not.

The question being taken on Mr. MATSON's motion, there were—ayes 102, noes 59.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the unfinished business, being House bill No. 545; and I also move that all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto be limited to five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is first on the motion to limit debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumes consideration of House bill No. 545. The debate on the pending section has been limited by order of the House to five minutes.

Mr. EVERHART. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> In line 8, section 1, strike out all between the word "and," in line 7, and the word "the," in line 8, and after the word "years," in line 9, add the words "shall be increased to $4 per month;" so that it will read: "And the existing allowanee of $2 per month for each child under the age of sixteen years shall be increased to $4 per month."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the second section of the bill, as follows:

> SEC. 2. That no claim agent or attorney shall be recognized in the adjudication of claims under this act, nor shall any such person be entitled to receive any compensation whatever for services or pretended services in making applications thereunder.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which is already at the Clerk's desk as an addition to the second section of the bill.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

> And that if any person shall receive any money, either directly or indirectly, for services actually rendered or alleged to have been rendered in the prosecution of any claims under this act, he or she shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $500, or undergo an imprisonment of not less than six months, or both, or either, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is simply to make more effective the provisions of the second section of the bill presented by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Its object is to prevent the receipt of any money by any one either for services actually redered or for pretended services in securing a settlement or adjustment of any claim under this act. As the bill now stands, with this section unamended, what is there to prevent any attorney or claim agent from making a demand or receiving money from any claimants under this act for either services rendered or for services pretended to have been rendered the claimant in effecting the settlement of his, her, or their claim? The agent or attorney may appear before the Department without coming to the surface by actually appearing of record. There is nothing that can prevent an agent from appearing under cover. He may prepare the application for the allowance of a claim in the name of the applicant, and in this way avoid his appearance of record either as attorney for the claimant or as a pension agent; and what is there to prevent the party preparing the papers in the case in the manner suggested from receiving compensation after the claim has been allowed? Nothing, unless we cure the defect by imposing the penalty proposed by my amendment upon the party who either directly or indirectly receives money from claimants for services rendered or claimed to have been rendered in securing or aiding to secure the settlement of any of their claims.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will be adopted. It is offered for the purpose of perfecting the bill. It is not offered with any view of encumbering its provisions, but rather to make them more effective in protecting these beneficiaries, who are worthy of the Government's gratitude, from any imposition at the hands of claim agents of the country. There are amendments now pending, or we have heard speeches upon amendments that are to follow, the merits of which we recognize and most heartily approve. I refer especially to the one offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] and which will soon be reached in its turn. By it he seeks to secure the repeal of the limitation in the arrearages act, which now completely bars these pensioners from receiving the benefits of that legislation because perchance the application was not made in time or the filing of the claim was delayed by circumstances which could not be foreseen. I hope that amendment, however, will not be incorporated in this bill prepared by the Committee on Invalid Pensions and now under discussion.

I desire to see it passed as it came from the committee, with only the addition of the amendment I have offered, and which tends to make it more perfect. If a bill should hereafter be presented to this House embodying the provisions of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] it would receive my cordial support.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] has expired.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN], as I understand it, simply prescribes a penalty against those who take any fee or compensation for procuring these additional pensions?

Mr. SOWDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MATSON. The general law now provides a penalty to be imposed upon those who take from an applicant for pension any fee not authorized by law. But I have no objection to this amendment. I would rather have it adopted than occupy time in discussing it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SOWDEN, it was agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I now ask that the amendment suggested by myself at an early stage in the discussion of this bill be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

The Clerk read as follows:

That the proviso to the second section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress, approved January 25, 1879," approved March 3, 1879, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] allow me to appeal to him to permit me to speak five minutes on this question before he presents his point of order?

Mr. ROGERS. If I can reserve my point of order, I will of course extend to the gentleman the courtesy he asks.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The point of order will, I think, be reserved by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROGERS. The chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON], who has this bill in charge, does not desire the debate to go on unless it can proceed upon both sides. Therefore I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. ROGERS. I submit that the amendment is obnoxious to clause 4 of Rule XXI; and I make the additional point, though with some doubt as to its correctness, that the amendment is not germane to the subject-matter. I should like to be indulged in a few remarks on this point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. In the discussion of a similar question a few moments ago I said that, if my memory served me rightly, the Speaker or a chairman of the Committee of the Whole, I was not sure which, had held in the last Congress that where an amendment was offered which was a section or the substance of a section of another bill then pending in the House it was obnoxious to the clause of the rule I have cited. I desire now to correct that statement, because I find that my memory did not serve me correctly. I am informed such had been the ruling prior to that time, and I suppose I got the impression stated from the discussion at that time.

But the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] is, I think, clearly obnoxious to clause 4, Rule XXI. I hold in my hand two bills, one of which (H. R. 540), introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], seeks to accomplish precisely the same object that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] endeavors to accomplish. I will send the bill to the Chair. From information in my possession I think, though I have not here the bills themselves, that there are perhaps half a dozen bills looking to this same object. I have here one, introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the first section of which embodies if I am not mistaken, the same idea as the amendment now proposed.

Mr. Chairman, the RECORD shows also that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] introduced a similar bill—a bill proposing to accomplish the very same purposes sought by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The provision of the statute which the gentleman from Indiana seeks to repeal is found in the twentieth volume of the Statutes at Large, page 470. He proposes to repeal the proviso of section 2 of the act of March 3, 1879, that proviso being in these words:

Provided, The application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions prior to the 1st day of July, 1880, otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the application; but the limitation herein prescribed shall not apply to claims by or in behalf of insane persons and children under sixteen years of age.

That is one of the provisos of the sections proposed to be repealed. The other is found on page 265 of the same volume, and is the proviso to the second section of the act of March 3, 1873.

Now I think, by a comparison of these provisions of the statutes (which I will send to the desk) with the bill of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], the Chair will find that the object sought to be accomplished by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana on the other side [Mr. BROWNE] is covered in substance by the bill of his colleague on this side [Mr. MATSON].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I can not discuss this question unless I have an opportunity to see the bills referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will give the gentleman that opportunity.

Mr. ROGERS. I send to the desk another bill for the information of the Chair.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the act of January 25, 1879, provides for the payment of arrearages of pensions, that act being usually denominated "the arrearage-of-pensions act." The act of March 3, 1879, simply makes appropriations to execute the provisions of the arrearage act, adding, however, a section which defines the manner in which the arrearages shall be computed; and there is also a general proviso that no claim shall be paid under the operations of the law unless presented on or before the 1st of July, 1880.

Now, my proposition is simply to repeal the proviso. It does not add a word to any statute. It does not pretend to prescribe the condition on which any payment may be made, but simply takes away the proviso by which all that remains of both these two statutes is left operative.

In order to determine whether or not either of the two bills is substantially my proposition I will be compelled to read the bills and also the first section of the arrearages act. That first section I will let the Clerk read, and he may as well read the third section, too.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1. That all pensions which have been granted under the general laws regulating pensions, or may hereafter be granted, in consequence of death from a cause which originated in the United States service during the continuance of the late war of the rebellion, or in consequence of wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in said service during said war of the rebellion, shall commence from the date of the death or discharge from said service of the person on whose account the claim has been or shall hereafter be granted, or from the termination of the right of the party having prior title to such pension: Provided, The rate of pension for the intervening time for which arrears of pension are hereby granted shall be the same per month for which the pension was originally granted.

SEC. 3. That section 4717 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides that—

"No claim for pension not prosecuted to a successful issue within five years from the date of filing the same shall be admitted without record evidence from the War or Navy Department of the injury or the disease which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made: Provided, That in any case in which the limitation prescribed by this section bars the further prosecution of the claim, the claimant may present, through the Pension Office, to the Adjutant-General of the Army or the Surgeon-General of the Navy evidence that the disease or injury, which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made, originated in the service and in the line of duty; and if such evidence is deemed satisfactory by the officer to whom it may be submitted, he shall cause a record of the fact so proved to be made, and a copy of the same to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Pensions, and the bar to the prosecution of the claim shall thereby be removed"— be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. ROGERS. In order to elucidate the act will the gentleman from Indiana let his amendment be read right now?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the proviso to the second section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, approved March 3, 1879," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Now, if the Chair has that appropriation act, I would be glad if the Clerk would read the proviso which the bill proposes to repeal.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Indiana there is no proviso in the act of January 25, 1879.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am aware of that; it is the act of March 3, 1879.

Mr. ROGERS. Does not your amendment designate it improperly?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think not.

Mr. ROGERS. I think so, if you will listen to it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It provides that the second section of the act of March 3, 1879, which limits the operation of the act of January 25, 1879, shall be repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proviso which the gentleman proposes to repeal by the amendment which he has offered.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am sure my amendment is drawn correctly. It may have been printed incorrectly.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the Clerk has read it incorrectly. It does not prescribe——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the amendment reported by the Clerk.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me say there is no proviso to the second section.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Of March 3, 1879?

Mr. ROGERS. But he says January 25, 1879.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the gentleman will only pay attention he will see it is all right.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will finish the reading of the proviso.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions prior to the 1st day of July, 1880, otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application, but the limitation herein prescribed shall not apply to claims by or in behalf of insane persons or children under sixteen years of age.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like now to see the two bills to which the gentleman from Arkansas has referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will send them to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the committee will get back to the proposition I will repeat it. A general law was passed granting arrearages of pensions to certain persons who are prescribed in its first section. That law was passed on the 25th of January, 1879. On the 3d of March, 1879, the House appropriated the money for the payment of those arrearages, and the second section of that act of the 3d of March, 1879, contains a proviso substantially saying that unless the claim is presented on or before the 1st of July, 1880, the claimant shall not receive his pay.

My proposition is to repeal that proviso. Its effect is to leave all of the other legislation of Congress, and especially the act of the 25th of January, 1879, and the residue of the act of March 3, 1879, operative and in full force. As I stated before, the adoption of this amendment does not add a word to any statute of the United States on the subject of pensions. Or, in other words, having taken from the second section the proviso, it leaves all the balance of the legislation of Congress operative and in full force.

Now, it is said that there are bills pending which, under the fourth clause of the twenty-first rule, render the proposition I have submitted out of order as an amendment to this bill. I believe it is not insisted by the gentleman from Arkansas now that, if a similar proposition is inserted in some other bill but associated with other measures, for that reason it ought to be rejected under the point of order. But two bills, plain and simple, containing but single propositions, have been referred to as being substantially what is, or what will result from the adoption of, my amendment, and hence render the amendment subject to the point of order. The first is:

That all acts and parts of acts by which the time is limited for filing meritorious applications for pensions, and having them duly considered and allowed when supported by satisfactory proofs, are hereby repealed.

This is House bill No. 482, introduced by my colleague [Mr. LOWRY]. Now I confess that I cannot find, within the short time that I have had to examine the statutes, to what subjects this may be applied. What construction may be placed on it by the Pension Bureau in the event it is passed by the Congress of the United States I do not know. It says, and I will repeat it:

That all acts and parts of acts by which the time is limited for filing meritorious applications for pensions, and having them duly considered and allowed when supported by satisfactory proofs, are hereby repealed.

I do not believe that any lawyer will construe this into making a claim relate back to the time when the injury was incurred, or when the claimant was discharged from the military service in consequence of it. But it does provide that there shall be no limitation as to the time for filing meritorious applications for pensions. That is all.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I do not know of any law now that limits the time within which meritorious applications for pensions may be filed. They are being filed under the law every day. The proposition that this comes within the purview of my amendment, so as to render the amendment subject to the point of order, I think need not be discussed for a single moment.

Let me emphasize it, however, as I feel very much interested in this measure:

All acts and parts of acts by which the time is limited for filing meritorious applications for pensions.

Why, this arrearage act nowhere contains a limitation on the time within which meritorious applications for pensions shall be filed. The arrearage act simply refers to the time to which the allowance of pension shall relate. That is all. If the application be filed now it relates to the date of application; if it had been filed before the operation of the arrearage act it would go back to the antecedent time; and the limitation in the act of the 3d of March, 1879, is a limitation upon so much of the bill as makes the pension retroactive. It does not pretend to limit the time within which the claim shall be filed; and if this amounts to anything, it is at most but to repeal some general statute of limitation by which at some time a pension claim would be barred.

The next bill introduced by my friend the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions provides:

That from and after the passage of this act all pensions now in force, or in all pensions hereafter granted, the same shall begin with the date of the discharge of the claimant, or in case of claims of widows and dependent relatives, with the date of the death of the soldier on whose account said pension is granted.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the foregoing provision are hereby repealed.

And my friend who sits near me here [Mr. CASWELL] suggests to me a conclusive answer to the point made as to this bill. If the Chair will examine he will find that the act of the 3d of March, 1879, provides a method in which the antecedent pension, the arrearages, shall be computed. That is to say, if a pension is for total disability, and when the claim was originally allowed the rate was $34 a month, which was subsequently, a year after we will say, increased to $50, and after another year it went to $72 a month, this act of the 3d of March, 1879, provides that the Secretary of the Interior in making the rating shall compute the time under which the pension was operative under each of the several ratings. Now, under the original act, and I desire the Chair to pay attention to it—under the original act which was sought to be amended by the act of the 3d of March, 1879, there was a general provision almost in the language of the bill of my friend the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It was a general provision that all pensions should relate back to the date of the discharge; but it did not provide any method for the computation of the pension—I mean the pension that would accrue under the act antecedent to the time that the pension was granted under the certificate of the Pension Office.

Now let me say that if this bill is to pass—and I desire to impress it upon the Chair and the gentleman from Arkansas—I ask him as a lawyer if this bill is to pass in what way will you compute these arrears of pensions? I wish the gentleman would answer the question, and I give him the question now that he may have the opportunity of making the answer. This bill expressly provides—

That from and after the passage of this act all pensions now in force, or in all pensions hereafter granted, the same shall begin with the date of the discharge of the claimant.

I need not read any further.

The same shall begin from the date of the discharge of the claimant.

Now let me ask my friend this question: Suppose when the disability was incurred the claimant would have been entitled to $2 month, and suppose afterward it increased so the rating would have been $4 per month, and when it had further increased to $6 the pension was granted at that rate; then suppose there was another increase of disability and the evidence showed that for a certain period he was entitled to $8 a month and he was pensioned at that rate; and suppose after the pension was granted it was increased by act of Congress from time to time; let me ask you how, under the provisions of this bill, this pension would be rated? It could not be rated at all. It provides no method for computation. It is not rated at all by any law of Congress. Suppose you find this rating in the act of 3d of March, 1879—and so far as that provision in that act is concerned this bill by operation of law repeals it—it sends the pension back to the date of its allowance at the rate that the pensioner is receiving at the time the application for the retroactive pension is made. That is what it does.

Mr. Chairman, there is another thing that is equally conclusive, if not more so. This arrearage act did not create an original pension. It simply granted arrearages of pay in certain cases. It referred to cases that were pending, to be sure, and those that would be filed afterward. Now, suppose that under this bill application is filed for a pension, and suppose an application is made by one who has already been pensioned and has received or has not received the benefits of the arrearage act, what kind of construction will the Commissioner of Pensions put upon the act, and will it be construed to apply at all to any act that is barred by the statute of limitations?

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to send up a bill of Mr. HENDERSON'S on the same subject? I will follow that up by the bill of Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not care to discuss these bills further.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire to make a further suggestion in aid of the point made by the gentleman from Indiana. This bill if enacted would not extend to the class of cases that were filed prior to July 1, 1880, and already entitled to pension certificates. This only applies to pensions hereafter granted. The object is to extend the operation of the pensions back to the time of discharge. It would not reach that class of cases where the claim was filed since the arrears act took effect if they were granted before the passage of this act. That would be a large class it would not extend to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from Arkansas will allow me to say the bill he last sent up, that of Mr. HENDERSON, is obnoxious to the same objection I made to another, that it provides no method of computing arrears of pensions, but leaves it as it would have been under the original act of January 25, 1879.

Mr. ROGERS rose.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] I understand desires further to examine this question. I move that the committee now rise. It is a very important matter, and we desire it to be thoroughly discussed and thoroughly investigated on both sides.

The motion of Mr. MATSON was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 671) making an appropriation for the purchase of the old Produce Exchange building and the site bounded by Whitehall, Pearl, Moore, and Water streets, New York city, for Army purposes.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the title of a bill which has been improperly referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1561) to refund duties upon goods on shipboard when the tariff act of March 3, 1883, went into effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill was improperly referred to the Committee on Claims. It should be referred to the Committe on Ways and Means.

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not a private bill, but a bill relating to duties upon goods on shipboard when the tariff act went into effect. It properly goes to the Ways and Means Committee.

The objection being withdrawn, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

FREE MAIL DELIVERY SYSTEM.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4414) to extend the free-delivery system of the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ALLOWANCES FOR CLERK-HIRE TO POSTMASTERS.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 4415) to make the allowances for clerk-hire to postmasters of first and second class post-offices cover the cost of clerical labor in the money-order business, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

FUND FOR RAILWAY POSTAL CLERKS.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 4416) to provide a fund for railway postal clerks and for the care and distribution thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

DELIVERY OF LETTERS IN CARE OF HOTELS AND CLUBS.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 4417) to facilitate the transmission and delivery of letters addressed in care of hotels and clubs; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

READJUSTMENT OF POSTMASTERS' SALARIES.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 4418) to limit the time in which the applications of certain postmasters for readjustment of salaries may be made; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 4419) to authorize the appointment of an additional assistant postmaster-general, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL LAWS AND REGULATIONS.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 4420) to authorize the publication of a new edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BEAN: Preamble and resolutions of citizens of Tombstone to the governor of Arizona to convene the Legislature to provide ways and means to render life and property safe from hostile Indians in Arizona—to the Committee on the Territories.

Also, petition of citizens of Graham County, Arizona, for removal of the Indians from San Carlos reservation—to the same committee.

By Mr. BENNETT: Petition of Hardy Summerline, of Brunswick County, North Carolina, for the reference of his war claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, petition of George Seamone, for a pension—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. T. M BROWNE: Petitions of Capt. H. H. Darter and 120 others, ex-soldiers and citizens, Delaware County; and of Alexander C. Walker and 85 others, ex-soldiers and citizens, of Wayne County, Indiana, for a service pension for all soldiers and sailors of the late war, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: Memorial of John F. Paxon, for adjustment of certain postmasters' salaries—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CURTIN: Petition of cigar-makers and tobacco-growers of Clinton County, Pennsylvania, asking an increase of tariff on Sumatra wrappers and binders to $1 per pound—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CUTCHEON: Memorial of Alonzo Smith, Post 356, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, with reference to military record of Charles W. Lambert, late Company F, One hundred and fifty-second New York Volunteers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GALLINGER: Affidavit in support of bill (H. R. 3543) granting a pension to Mary A. Moulton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GLASS: A bill to improve the navigation of the Forked Deer River, in West Tennessee, and appropriating $10,000 therefor—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. R. S. GREEN: Memorial against bills Nos. 1220 and 1601—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HAYDEN: Petition of A. A. Sherman and others, of Lexington, Mass., in aid of Fitz-John Porter—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HERMAN: Petition of John Campbell, of Oregon, for relief—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HEWITT: Petition of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, for an appropriation to discharge liens and expenses upon the old post-office site purchased by them in the city of New York—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KLEINER: Petition of citizens of Lynnville, Warrick County, Indiana, asking a pension of $8 per month to the honorably discharged soldiers of the Union Army—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LOVERING: Papers relating to the resolution in favor of Seth Wilmarth, of Malden, Mass.—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McKINLEY: Resolution of the district convention of the Knights of Labor held at Canton, Ohio, protesting against the demonetization of silver, and urging the passage of the Bland silver bill—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. MILLARD: Petition of S. N. Hess and others, asking a pension for all honorably discharged soldiers suffering under disability—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of George Kent & Co. and others, of Binghamton, N. Y., opposing any increase of tariff on Sumatra tobacco—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PAYNE: Petition of R. C. Barless and others, in favor of bill (H. R. 3549) granting a pension to Theodore McWharf—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, affidavit of Mrs. L. S. Parker, for payment of readjusted salary of postmasters—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SENEY: Petition of F. E. Willard and 6 others, to so amend the Constitution as to confer suffrage on females—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SWOPE: Petition of 400 tobacco-growers and others, of York County, Pennsylvania, asking that section 2 of Schedule F, tariff act of 1883, relative to the importation of tobacco, be amended—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILLIAM WARNER: A petition of Capt. F. C. Jones and 3,668 others, officers and soldiers of the late war from the States of Missouri, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, Nebraska, Iowa, Delaware, Connecticut, Michigan, Kansas, Vermont, New Hampshire, Ohio, Massachusetts, Indiana, West Virginia, New Jersey, Wisconsin, Maryland, and the Territories of Dakota and Washington, asking relief of certain volunteer officers who enlisted early in the war and were promoted—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WELLBORN: Papers relating to the claim of John C. Jones—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER: Memorial of Catherine Herston, widow of Wm. C. Herston, praying the reference of her claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

The following petitions, praying Congress to place the coinage of silver upon an equality with gold; that there be issued coin certificates of one, two, and five dollars, the same being made legal tender; that one and two dollar legal-tender notes be issued, and that the public debt be paid as rapidly as possible by applying for this purpose the idle surplus now in the Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

By Mr. GILFILLAN: Of citizens of Hennepin County, Minnesota.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 22, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTINGENT FUND, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of expenditures of the contingent fund of the Navy Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

PRINTING OF REPORT ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the statute, the Chair also lays before the House, for reference to the Committee on Printing, the following Senate concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 15,000 additional copies of the report of the Senate Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, together with the testimony, be printed; 5,000 for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw the application, affidavits, and all the papers in the claim of Alexander Goble, late corporal Company F, Sixty-third Regiment, and Company H, One hundred and fifth Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteers, from the files of the House without leaving copies, no adverse report having been made thereon.

REPORT ON WAGES.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to make a privileged report, and to ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 57), to print an addition to a report on wages ordered printed January 17, 1884, report the same back to the House, and recommend its passage.

The joint resolution as reported is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print, as an addition to the report on the statistics of wages in manufacturing industries, prepared by Mr. Joseph D. Weeks, and ordered printed by the House of Representatives January 17, 1884, a report on the relative wages in the United States and Great Britain, compiled by Mr. Weeks.

SEC. 2. That a sum not to exceed $500 be, and hereby is, appropriated to prepare said report for publication.

The SPEAKER. The committee do not seem to have submitted any estimate of the cost of the proposed printing.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The estimate is that the cost will not exceed $400; $350 is the amount proposed.

The SPEAKER. For the printing?

Mr. FARQUHAR. For the printing of this addition to the report on wages.

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House require the committee to present in each case an estimate of the cost of the printing proposed, but that point seems not to be made in this case. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. FARQUHAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. GIBSON, of Maryland, for two days.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the Chair will proceed to call the committees for reports of bills of a private nature.

ERASURE OF INSCRIPTIONS, NORFOLK NAVY-YARD.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of presenting a privileged report from the Committee on Naval Affairs. The committee instruct me to report back a resolution, which was referred to them, with certain amendments; and I ask that the report be read, after which I shall demand the previous question upon the report and amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs has had under consideration the resolution referred to it by the House of Representatives, making inquiries of the honorable Secretary of the Navy relating to the alleged erasure of certain inscriptions at the Norfolk navy-yard and other matters, and beg leave to report back the said resolution and recommend its passage with the following amendments thereto:

Amend by inserting the word "and" between the words "ordered" and "upon," in the resolution, and by striking out after the words "what authority," in the resolution, and inserting in lieu of the words stricken out the following:

"Honorable inscriptions have been obliterated and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States have at any time been dismissed from the Norfolk navy-yard, and to transmit to this House copies of all correspondence in relation to dismissals or details made by order of the Secretary of the Navy, or his immediate predecessor, at the Norfolk navy-yard or in the light-house."

The resolution as amended will read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House such information as he possesses concerning the truth or falsity of certain statements which have appeared in the public prints, as follows:

"First. That the commandant at the United States navy-yard at Norfolk, Va., has caused the honorable inscriptions heretofore borne upon the cannon captured by the United States military or naval forces to be obliterated.

"Second. That said commandant has caused to be removed from the dry-dock at that navy-yard the tablet placed there at the time of its reconstruction, and bearing the inscription:

"'Destroyed by the rebels in 1862. Rebuilt by the United States Government in 1863.

"'J. W. LIVINGSTON,
"'Commandant.
"'W. H. LYONS,
"'Superintendent of Machinery.'

"Third. That because of his protest against the removal of said inscription the superintendent who was in charge of the work of rebuilding said dock, and who had faithfully served the Government for many years, has been removed from his position and a person who engaged in military service against the Government appointed in his place.

"Fourth. That in disregard of that 'grateful recognition of the services, sacrifices, and sufferings of persons honorably discharged from the military and naval service of the country,' invoked by sections 1753 and 1754 of the Revised Statutes, a number of such honorably discharged soldiers or sailors of the United States has been dismissed from employment at said navy-yard and their places filled by men who fought against the Government during the late rebellion.'"

And be it further resolved, That if said foregoing allegations are true, the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House upon whose order and upon what authority honorable inscriptions have been obliterated, and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States have at any time been dismissed from the Norfolk navy-yard; and to transmit to this House copies of all correspondence in relation to dismissals or details made by order of the Secretary of the Navy, or his immediate predecessor, at the Norfolk navy-yard, or in the light-house district in which said navy-yard is situated.

Mr. HERBERT. I demand the previous question on the report and amendments.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the previous question on the adoption of the report and amendments.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether the previous question, if ordered, will cut off an opportunity for amendment in the House.

The SPEAKER. It will; but there will be debate allowed under the rule for thirty minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to ask my friend the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs if his object in demanding the previous question is to prevent a statement of the facts upon which this resolution was based.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman will have fifteen minutes within which to make his statement of facts. The resolution as amended calls for substantially all of the facts demanded by the resolution he submitted. It is in substance the same as the resolution originally introduced by the gentleman himself, except that it is broader; and he will have, I repeat, fifteen minutes within which to make his statement of facts.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then I understand the object is to cut off amendment and to limit the statement to fifteen minutes.

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 84.

Mr. REED, of Maine, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HERBERT and Mr. BOUTELLE were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 111, noes 7.

Mr. PERKINS. No quorum.

Mr. HERBERT. It is very evident that gentlemen do not want their own interrogatories answered; I therefore withdraw the report. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the withdrawal of the report, if it is within my parliamentary privilege to do so.

The SPEAKER. The report has not yet been acted upon by the House——

Mr. REED, of Maine. But, Mr. Speaker, it is being acted upon by the House. It is now in the possession of the House, and must be disposed of by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama made the report from the committee, and thereupon demanded the previous question upon the adoption of the amendment and the report. The Chair will examine the rule.

Mr. HERBERT. I retain the floor while this point is pending.

Mr. SPRINGER. Clause 2 of Rule XVI applies to this. It will be found on page 248 of the Digest.

Mr. HERBERT. I believe I have the right to withdraw the report before it is acted upon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clause 2, Rule XVI. When a motion has been made, the Speaker shall state it, or (if it be in writing) cause it to be read aloud by the Clerk before being debated, and it shall then be in the possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But this is a report of a committee, not a motion of an individual member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a proper construction of this rule is that it applies only to those motions made by members personally, on the floor, over which the member himself ought, as a matter of justice, to have control until a decision has been reached upon them by the House. Such a motion may be modified by the member introducing it at any time before final action is taken, and its character may be changed. But this is a report of a committee of the House, made to the House by the authority of the committee, and the Chair thinks that the gentleman himself can not withdraw it without the leave of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. REED, of Maine. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he allow amendments to be offered by his colleague on the committee.

Mr. HERBERT. I have no instructions to allow any amendments. This matter was considered in the committee, and I make the report in obedience to the action of the committee.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But the chairman of the committee can allow an amendment to be offered.

Mr. HERBERT. I decline to allow it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. There is a sufficient majority on the other side of the House to keep down any really obnoxious amendments.

Mr. HERBERT. The resolution embodies substantially all the inquiries contained in the original resolution. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee——

Many MEMBERS on the Democratic side. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am addressing myself to the chairman of the committee. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!"] Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If I am not to be allowed to address the chairman of the Committee I will address the Speaker.

Mr. HERBERT. I have stated that I would answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. HAMMOND. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will state his inquiry.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask whether the chairman of the committee has stated to the House that the Committee on Naval Affairs instructed him to call the previous question upon this report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not observe the statement the gentleman made.

Mr. HERBERT. I made no such statement.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest that the matter is immaterial. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] has the right to call the previous question without instructions from his committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE. He was not so instructed.

Mr. RANDALL. Gentlemen have no right to make inquiries or statements as to what occurred in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] moves a call of the House.

The question being taken on ordering a call of the House, there were—ayes 94, noes 86.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 123, not voting 46; as follows:

So a call of the House was ordered.

Before the result of the vote was announced the following proceedings took place:

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I object.

The names of members voting having been read,

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. HILL with Mr. LAIRD, until further notice.

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. KELLEY, until further notice.

Mr. DIBBLE with Mr. GOFF, for this day.

Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. SCRANTON, for this day.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL with Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, until Wednesday next.

Mr. GREEN, of North Carolina, with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, on this vote.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. JACKSON, for this day.

Mr. ARNOT with Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR, for this day.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House having been ordered, the Clerk will now call the roll, and members present will answer to their names as called.

Mr. HISCOCK. Before the roll is called I desire to ask leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, before the call is commenced the Chair will lay before the House requests for leave of absence.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PAYNE, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. FELTON, until Monday next.

To Mr. HISCOCK, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that leave of absence be granted to my colleague Mr. GREEN for one week. He is now absent on account of sickness.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. AIKEN, Mr. ARNOT, Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. BURLEIGH, Mr. FELTON, Mr. FINDLAY, Mr. FREDERICK, Mr. GLOVER, Mr. GOFF, Mr. GREEN of North Carolina, Mr. GIBSON of Maryland, Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina, Mr. HENLEY, Mr. HILL, Mr. HISCOCK, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. KELLEY, Mr. KING, Mr. PULITZER, Mr. RANKIN, Mr. RIGGS, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. SCRANTON, Mr. SOWDEN, Mr. STAHLNECKER, Mr. STONE of Massachusetts, and Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR.

The SPEAKER. It appears from the call of the roll there are two hundred and ninety-eight members present and twenty-seven absent. The Doorkeeper will now close the doors of the House.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask for a leave of absence until Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. This is not the time for making excuses.

Mr. HERBERT. I offer the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without leave of the House.

Mr. STEELE. I move that that resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Have the list of absentees read.

The SPEAKER. They have been called twice.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But has the list of absentees been read?

The SPEAKER. They have not been read.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I submit that it is in order to have that list read.

The SPEAKER. It is right to have the list of absentees read, as some of them may be absent on leave.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Opportunity should be given to offer excuses for those who are absent without leave before we take such violent means to bring them here.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read a list of the absentees, when excuses can be offered.

The Clerk then proceeded to call the list of absentees.

Mr. AIKEN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. ARNOT.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. Mr. ARNOT is absent from the House on account of illness, and I move he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM: No excuse offered.

Mr. BURLEIGH: No excuse offered.

Mr. FELTON: No excuse offered.

Mr. FINDLAY: No excuse offered.

Mr. FREDERICK: No excuse offered.

Mr. GIBSON, of Maryland: No excuse offered.

Mr. GLOVER: No excuse offered.

Mr. GOFF: No excuse offered.

Mr. GREEN, of North Carolina.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. My colleague Mr. GREEN is absent on account of sickness, and I move he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's colleague has already been excused on his previous motion.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. All right then.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. My colleague Mr. HENDERSON has been granted indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to offer excuses for any gentleman absent by leave of the House. The Chair will see no order is issued for the arrest of members who are absent on leave.

Mr. HENLEY: No excuse offered.

Mr. HILL: No excuse offered.

Mr. HISCOCK: No excuse offered.

Mr. JACKSON: No excuse offered.

Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLEY, has been confined to his bed for more than a week, and I ask that he be excused.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Let that be done by general consent.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. KING: No excuse offered.

Mr. PULITZER.

Mr. VIELE. My colleague is absent from the city, and I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANKIN.

Mr. CASWELL. My colleague is absent on account of sickness, and I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RIGGS: No excuse offered.

Mr. SCOTT: No excuse offered.

Mr. SCRANTON.

Mr. OSBORNE. My colleague is absent on leave.

Mr. SOWDEN: No excuse offered.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts.

Mr. DUNHAM. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors is sitting during the session of the House, and no doubt the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is a member of that committee, is attending the sessions of that committee.

The SPEAKER. That will be a good excuse when he comes in.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts, be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STAHLNECKER.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. STAHLNECKER was summoned to New York last night, and I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR.

Mr. HOUK. My colleague is at home attending the funeral of his father, and I move that he be excused.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The question recurred on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that the order offered for adoption by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] be laid on the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the following resolution:

Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without leave of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 108, noes 93.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HERBERT. I move to reconsider the resolution just adopted; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 109, noes 34.

Mr. STELLE. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 47 members voting therefor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. STEELE, and the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. HERBERT.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 136, noes 41.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I move that we dispense with all further proceedings under the call. It has become apparent there are only twelve absentees to be sent for, and that fact shows the House is unusually full—that there are enough members here for the transaction of the public business.

The sole question which now exists between the two sides of the House is a question of liberty of debate. No unreasonable time is asked for by the minority. They are perfectly ready to be contented with any reasonable time for debate, and we can dispose of the question in the regular way much sooner than we can by this consumption of time. No time is saved by proceedings of this nature. And I do not think as a matter of parliamentary law that the previous question was intended to cut off a reasonable amount of debate on the subject pending. It was not intended as a gag law for the minority, but simply as a means of protecting the majority from too prolonged a debate.

The debate which is asked for on this subject will not comprise more than an hour and a half or two hours on each side; and we shall certainly waste much more time than that without any object by proceedings of this kind. It can not be that the gentlemen on the other side with a majority of 40 are desirous of suppressing debate for fear of any consequences. It seems to me that they ought to be willing to have this question fully and fairly discussed.

One of the great objects of a meeting of Congress is to discuss questions of whatever kind they may be that may come before it and which are the subjects of its action, and the right of debate ought to be sacredly guarded by both sides. The means which are put in the hands of the majority for abridging an unreasonable continuance of debate ought not to be used for the purpose of silencing other gentlemen on the floor of the House.

What I have said is just as applicable to one side as to the other. It is reasonable and commends itself to the good sense of all the members of the House. And I submit to gentlemen on the other side that the proper course with regard to this matter and with regard to all other matters of this kind is to make a reasonable adjustment of the time for debate and allow the matter to be discussed.

No harm ever came in a free country by the free discussion of any proposition. This proposition which has been brought up here will have to be discussed in some shape or other, and it may as well be done decently and in order as in any other way. I appeal to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], who is not constrained by any vote of his committee—for as I understood him to say on the floor of the House his committee gave him no directions with regard to that—I appeal to him to withdraw his motion for a time and have an understanding that it shall be renewed after a reasonable time has been allowed for debate, and then let us proceed with the public business.

Mr. HERBERT. The rules of this House prescribe a reasonable time for debate upon such questions as this—fifteen minutes on each side after the previous question is ordered. This is simply a resolution of inquiry which originated on the other side of the House. There is nothing to debate until the inquiries shall have been answered. I therefore insist upon my motion.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Will the gentleman permit me a word? He proposes to add to the resolution which was introduced on this side of the House an amendment which discussion will show to be entirely futile. It will be shown not to produce the result the gentleman intends; and it is the object of all discussion to show mistakes which may have been made on the part of the committees.

Mr. HERBERT. We are entirely willing on this side to accept the consequences of any mistake we may have made by adding to the resolution introduced by gentlemen on the other side, and I think fifteen minutes a sufficient time to debate this resolution. If the inquiry we have added is futile the answer of the Secretary of the Navy will show it. The gentleman need not concern himself about that.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But it concerns the House. I am not undertaking to concern myself about this matter at all.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Regular order!

Mr. REED, of Maine. The regular order is the discussion of the motion I have presented, which is that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. That motion is debatable, and, if the Chair pleases, I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know of any rule of the House which prohibits debate on the pending motion.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Therefore the presumption is I have the floor.

Mr. HERBERT. I had not yielded the floor.

Mr. REED, of Maine. The gentleman will excuse me. He had yielded it. The gentleman had finished and I had begun.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not giving particular attention at the moment. The gentleman from Maine first took the floor and put a question to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], who rose to answer it, the gentleman from Maine still remaining standing; and the Chair did not understand whether he yielded the floor absolutely or simply for the answer of the question of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Allow me to explain, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Maine had completed what he had to say, as I understood it, before I rose.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I not only did not yield the floor, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] had finished his remarks and I had begun to address the Chair again and had closed a sentence, when the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] rose and called for the regular order, and I asseverated to the Speaker that the regular order was some remarks from me. [Laughter.]

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman was not on the floor——

Mr. McMILLIN (in his seat). Let him make his speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] will proceed, and after him the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. REED, of Maine. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will say, in response to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], that I have no desire whatever to make a speech. I simply desire to call the attention of the House——

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know whether, under the ruling of the Chair, the resolutions themselves are debatable.

The SPEAKER. They are not. The question, and the only question now before the House, is whether it will dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. HERBERT. I trust that the Chair will confine the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to that question.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that in discussing the question of the motion which I have presented to the House I may use such arguments as, in my complimentary fashion, I believe will move the other side of the House. [Laughter.]

I desire to say that I have no disposition whatever to make a speech or to enter upon the discussion of these resolutions. It is no part of my province and no part of my wish. I am not in possession of any information which I can give the House upon this subject, and therefore I am not disposed to discuss it. The proposition that I do wish to discuss is the reasonableness and propriety of debate on the part of the House on this subject. We sit here for no other purpose than to decide questions which legitmately come before us, and to decide them after debate. It is of the very essence of a free government that there shall be full and free debate; nor ought the existence or continuance of that debate to depend upon the opinion of any gentleman, or set of gentlemen, as to whether the matter is a proper subject of discussion or not. Whatever is suitable to come before this House is suitable to be debated by this House, and the normal condition of a preliminary assembly is that of debating questions which are brought before it.

Nevertheless, it was discovered that, in the ordinary course of human affairs, with a large body of men there was great danger that time would be wasted by discussing questions long after they had been decided in the minds of the members of the House; but the presumption is always in favor of debate, and while the House is armed with power to limit debate, it ought to be a reasonable limitation. Gentlemen wish to discuss this question. My colleague [Mr. BOUTELLE] wishes to discuss it, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY] wishes to discuss it, and I submit to the House that upon every principle of reasonable action in a parliamentary body such discussion ought to be permitted.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. REED, of Maine (continuing). And fifteen minutes does not seem to any fair-minded man—I will not say anything offensive, but I will say that it does not seem to me that fifteen minutes is a reasonable time for the discussion of a question of this kind.

Mr. HEWITT. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. REED, of Maine. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HEWITT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Does he yield the floor?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Oh, certainly.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, from what has been said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] so forcibly and eloquently in regard to the privilege of debate there will be no dissent on this side of the House. On the contrary, we upon this side of the House have for many years had to maintain the right of the representatives of the people to discuss important political questions, and many times since I have been in this House have I seen the other side of it attempt to check and repress debate, and on one memorable occasion, for more than two days, running into the third day, this side of the House was compelled to vindicate the privilege of debate. It does not lie in the mouth of the gentlemen on the other side to taunt this side of the House with any attempt to limit debate.

The House has settled this question by its rules. On resolutions of this sort the House has provided that fifteen minutes of discussion on each side, making thirty minutes in all, shall be allowed; and the decision of the House under the rules is justified in cases of resolutions of inquiry, from the fact that there is no information before this House upon which an intelligent debate can be had. The very object of the resolution is to get the facts upon which the debate may proceed. If gentlemen on the other side wish debate, I think I may pledge this side of the House and the committee of which I am a member to give them the amplest opportunity to discuss the resolution when we have the information before the House. But to undertake to come in here with a partisan statement of facts, about which no one is informed and no one can be informed until the inquiry is answered, and precipitate a debate on this House under these circumstances; is a waste of the public time and, in my judgment, an abuse of the confidence of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side].

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 95, noes 132.

Mr. REED, of Maine (after a pause). Mr. Speaker, I trust that proper measures are being taken to bring in the dozen gentlemen who are stopping the business of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms is out with his warrant.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Mr. RIGGS and Mr. SOWDEN.

The SPEAKER. Mr. RIGGS, you are reported as having been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. RIGGS. Mr. Speaker, if it were not that I might appear wanting in proper deference for you and the House, I would propound a question for myself. I should like to know by what authority any officer of the House can arrest me when I am in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, by the record made up after the roll-call had been called twice, appears to have been absent from the House.

Mr. RIGGS. I understand that is the appearance, but——

The SPEAKER. Of course the Sergeant-at-Arms had no discretion when acting under the authority of the House.

Mr. RIGGS. But I was not absent.

Mr. HAMMOND. It is impossible for me to hear the gentleman's excuse, and unless I hear it I shall not know how to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman [Mr. RIGGS] states he was in the House when the officer came to him.

Mr. HAMMOND. The point I desire to make is that gentlemen should take their seats, so that we may understand the business which is proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken; gentlemen will resume their seats. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RIGGS] was absent from the Hall of the House for a few minutes, as the Chair understands, and came back before the doors were closed, but after his name had been called.

Mr. RIGGS. That is the fact.

The SPEAKER. Shall the gentleman be excused?

Mr. SPRINGER. Under the circumstances I move that my colleague be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. SOWDEN, you are also reported as having been absent from the House without leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably detained this morning at the Pension Office on the business of my constituents, but I endeavored to get here as promptly as possible.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The deputy sergeant-at-arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Mr. BINGHAM.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BINGHAM, you are reported as having been absent from the House without leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, having attended the session of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads this morning at half-past 10 o'clock, and having sat through the entire meeting, I obtained a pair at 12 o'clock with the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY], in order that I might go to several of the Departments to attend to some business I had there. Believing that the House would go to the Private Calendar to-day, I thought that my return at this hour would be early enough for the general business of the House.

Mr. BEACH. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HERBERT. It seems, Mr. Speaker, there is a quorum present of those who will vote on this motion, and we can dispense with the call if all the Democrats now in the House shall remain and vote. I therefore move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. REED, of Maine. How many of the half-dozen does that leave out still absent?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The doors of the House will be reopened. The question is on the demand made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] for the previous question on the adoption of the report which he has submitted.

Mr. HERBERT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 160, nays 91, not voting 73; as follows:

So the previous question was ordered to be now put.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HERBERT moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. BOUTELLE objected.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. GREEN, of North Carolina, with Mr. HISCOCK, for one week.

Mr. GIBSON, of Maryland, with Mr. PAYNE, for one week.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. FELTON, until Monday next.

Mr. HENLEY with Mr. BINGHAM, for to-day.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate; fifteen minutes in support of the report and fifteen minutes against it. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] in support of the report and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] in opposition.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not desire to debate this question unless something is said on the other side of the House. The committee has reported back the resolutions referred to them and they are simply resolutions of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of the Navy. I will reserve the balance of my time until I hear from the other side of the House—if they desire to discuss the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the first legislative action of this House of Representatives at the present session was the passage of an act by unanimous consent, for which purpose the entire legislative business of the country was suspended, to remove the political disabilities of an ex-confederate who had waited more than twenty years before discovering that he desired to be placed in the line of eligibility to appointment under the executive department of the United States. In contrast with that I have been tauntingly informed here to-day that fifteen minutes of time is an ample allowance to present the case of the outrageous dismissal of the disabled veterans of the Union armies from the employment of the Government, and the defacement, obliteration, and removal of memorials of the success of the Union armies. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that these facts in themselves and in their juxtaposition may prove more impressive to this country than any remarks I might have been able to offer on the subject.

The resolution which I introduced some two weeks ago related the fact that the public journals of this country alleged that an officer of the United States Government, at one of the navy-yards of the Government, had ordered the obliteration or effacement of honorable inscriptions upon cannon captured by the forces of the United States, and had caused to be removed from its place at the dry-dock at the Norfolk navy-yard a memorial tablet setting forth the destruction of that navy-yard by the rebels in 1862 and the reconstruction of the dry-dock by the United States Government in 1863.

I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, that the facts as set forth in that resolution have in any wise been contradicted. On the contrary, I find that in a newspaper entitled the Landmark, published in the city of Norfolk, in an editorial printed two days after the resolutions were introduced in this House, the editor of that paper, himself being closely connected as I understand in intercourse and intimacy with that officer of the Norfolk navy-yard, stated as follows:

> Resolutions of inquiry have been introduced in Congress by Mr. BOUTELLE, of Maine, relative to alleged actions of the commandant of this naval station; but we make bold to say that in place of implied censure, Commodore Truxton is entitled to praise. * * *
> When he took charge of this navy-yard he found an inscription which was intended to keep alive the bitter memories of our civil strife; and it is understood that with the patriotic remark that "the war had been over twenty years," he had this removed.

That tablet, Mr. Speaker, was placed on that dry-dock after the reconstruction of the works there in 1863 by the United States Government by the order, primarily, as I am informed, of Admiral Joseph Smith, formerly of the State of Maine, at that time Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and also by the order and authority of the then commandant at the navy-yard, whose name appeared upon it with that of the superintendent of machinery, who had supervised the rebuilding of the dock.

This superintendent, Mr. W. H. Lyons, had found himself at Norfolk at the outbreak of the war, and being enabled to render to the United States very valuable service, by furnishing drawings of the rebel ironclad Merrimac to the Government at Washington, he was recognized, on our accession to the control of that place, by an appointment authorized by the President, Abraham Lincoln, and made by Hon. Gideon Welles, then Secretary of the Navy, as superintendent of the machinery at that yard. He held that position with ability until the time when he was ordered by this commandant to take down that honorable memorial of the recapture of that navy-yard by the Government, and because of his demurring to the effacement of that honorable record he was summarily dismissed and a man appointed in his place whose title to the position rested solely upon his services in the confederate army.

I deemed that, Mr. Speaker, a sufficient reason for offering the resolution calling the attention of the House of Representatives to this matter. I found, further, that since the 4th day of March, 1885, there has been at that navy-yard a repeated and systematic removal from the positions in which they were placed by the officers of the Government in recognition of their services in behalf of this nation of the wounded and disabled veterans of the Republic to make places for the men who fought to destroy it. I deemed that also a fitting matter to call to the attention of the House of Representatives and of the country.

Now, sir, I can not in the scanty moments allowed me read you this roster of names of Union soldiers and sailors thus removed which I have upon my desk. I have not time to read you the appeal that comes to me from the Richmond Post of the Grand Army of the Republic, that little outpost of patriots located down there in Virginia, against the outrages upon their comrades. I am obliged to hasten forward, and in this general manner simply touch upon what is covered by my resolution. I desire to say, however, that the attempt, wherever made or by whomsoever made, to set up the plea that the tearing down of the loyal memorials of the war is demanded by any broad spirit of patriotism—the plea that the men on the other side are anxious to obliterate the recollections of the war—is based upon absolute sophistry. I say that if the time has come, or if it shall ever come, to obliterate the grand memorials of that contest in which the nation's life was preserved, let us first have the monuments of rebellion itself torn down. Let us not begin by blotting out the inscriptions commemorating the victory over rebellion won by the loyal soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States.

I have here on my desk a long list of the great marble memorials that are going up all over the South to perpetuate the memory of treason and rebellion. I have here a description of a monument erected but a few years ago in Georgia bearing inscriptions breathing anything but a spirit of loyalty to this Government, a monument bearing upon its face the evidence of a desire to perpetuate the memory of the attack that was made upon the life of our Government; and while these memorials stand, here in the very capital of the nation, in the great art repository of Washington, the one-armed or one-legged soldier, or the soldier's widow, who comes to the seat of Government, may wander in vain through its galleries looking for the counterfeit presentment of a single one of the glorious heroes who sustained the flag upon the field of battle; they will find that the only military chiefs who have a place in the famous Corcoran Art Gallery at Washington are Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson. And, Mr. Speaker, these portraitures are not simply to keep alive the memory of great men as citizens, but they are the likenesses of soldiers; they are decked in full confederate uniform, and represented as in the field of action directing and guiding the armies marshaled against the life of the nation.

Down in Lexington, Va., we have in a marble sculpture of the soldier-chieftain Lee, in full confederate uniform, a similar exhibition of the determination of people on that side that the memory of the rebellion against the Government shall not be obliterated. Two years ago while this House was considering the appropriation of a million of dollars to the New Orleans Exposition, to encourage fraternal feeling and brotherly regard, the people down there who are so anxious to have Union memorials obliterated were erecting and dedicating a monument thirty feet high to Robert E. Lee, the military head of the great rebellion.

In view of these facts, Mr. Speaker, I say there is no basis for this claim that broad patriotism on our part requires us to begin here at the North or at the South in obliterating the records of the grandest triumph that was ever won for humanity since the morning stars sang together. [Applause.]

I believe that the people of this country should say as that grand old hero General Dix said in regard to the American flag, if any man attempts to pull down a single memorial of the great triumph of the loyal people of this country, shoot him on the spot! [Applause.]

Gentlemen have talked about the desire to bury the memories of the war. A few days ago, after we had had a meeting of the Naval Committee, a report was sent down to a Richmond (Va.) paper in which I was spoken of with that degree of politeness habitual to gentlemen of that locality; and I was informed substantially that I had been macerated and desiccated by the gentleman from Virginia. And I found in the same paper a very pertinent article headed, "The Southern Historical Society Papers," which affords evidence that our Southern friends are not so anxious to forget their part in the war. I find one of the contributions to these papers thus referred to:

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, written by Mr. BALLENTINE, and presented May 31, 1884, is an able and exhaustive discussion of the fight between the Merrimac and the Monitor, and refutes conclusively the popular delusion at the North that the Monitor whipped the Merrimac.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen are not anxious to have the history of the war wiped out. They want to write it over. They want to inscribe confederate victory across the face of the records that show the great triumphs of the Union arms. In my humble way I propose to enter my protest here and always against every such attempt.

Whether I stand here or elsewhere, whether my position be that of a member of Congress on this floor or a citizen in private life, I enter my protest against that morbid sentimentality, against that false idea of magnanimity, which would suggest to us for one moment to tolerate the laying of the hands of desecration upon the memorials of the triumph of the Union armies.

For lack of time I can not go into this matter of the removal of our soldiers from the places where they were earning their bread in the service of the Government. We have on our statute-books two distinct statutes proclaiming that this country, in grateful remembrance of "the services, sacrifices, and sufferings" of our soldiers and sailors, will give them preference over even the loyal civilian in its employment. That has not only been treated with contempt, but in the case of the Norfolk navy-yard and of the Norfolk custom-house they have turned out gallant, efficient, worthy, faithful public servants, comrades of the loyal hosts who followed the flag of their country across a hundred battlefields, turning them out in defiance of that other statute which prohibits political proscription in navy-yards, and for the purpose of filling their places with men who fought to destroy this Government. [Applause.]

Mr. HERBERT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE.]

Mr. WISE. In the brief time which is allotted to me I have opportunity to make only a statement of facts. I had hoped that the subject of this resolution would not have been discussed in this House until we had been informed by the Secretary of the Navy. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] on more occasions than one has sought to revive the passions and the prejudices of the war. Let us see how much of truth there is in the statements of this resolution.

The Secretary of the Navy is called upon to report to this House if any tablet has been destroyed at the Norfolk navy-yard which commemorates or commemorated the fact that the dry-dock at Portsmouth had been destroyed. I am glad of the opportunity to inform the gentleman from Maine that the dry-dock at Portsmouth never was destroyed. [Applause.]

The gentleman asks the Secretary of the Navy if inscriptions have been removed from guns captured from the confederate army. I will inform the gentleman from Maine that no guns with such inscriptions were ever in the Portsmouth navy-yard.

Mr. BOUTELLE rose.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman from Maine wants to know if a Union soldier has been discharged and a confederate put in his place. The man who was discharged was never in the Union army, was never within a thousand miles of a line of battle, never heard the music of a minie bullet.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Did he not render great service to the country?

Mr. WISE. No, sir; no, sir! He, sir, was in receipt of a large salary in a bomb-proof position [laughter on the Democratic side] while brave men fought the battles of their country.

Mr. BRADY. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Does he yield?

Mr. WISE. No, sir; no, sir!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WISE. No, sir; I do not yield. I will give my attention to you [addressing Mr. BRADY] in a moment. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRADY. The gentleman will not allow me an opportunity to reply. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. WISE. The confederate, or the man who the gentleman from Maine alleges was appointed on account of services in the confederate army, was selected after a competitive examination, and the man to whom he refers as having been removed was dismissed for beastly intoxication. [Renewed laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. What man do you refer to?

Mr. WISE. One other fact I commend to the consideration of the gentleman from Maine. During the Arthur administration the postmaster at Portsmouth, who was a Union soldier twice wounded and twice promoted for gallantry, was removed at the dictation of William Mahone. [Renewed laughter.] Ah! Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's five minutes have expired. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!" "Let him go on!"]

Mr. WISE (continuing). Ah, Mr. Speaker, it is a good thing to raise a fuss over this matter, is it? Your fellow-citizens in Maine [addressing Mr. BOUTELLE] are anxious to know if a confederate has been appointed in the Norfolk navy-yard by this Administration. Have you forgotten that during the Grant administration, that during the administration of Hayes, and during the Arthur administration you sought out the captain of the confederate guerillas, John S. Mosby, and sent him to represent the Government of the United States in a foreign country? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Have you forgotten that Longstreet, a confederate lieutenant-general, was selected by your Republican administrations for the most important office in Georgia? Why is it, I would ask the gentleman from Maine, that we have not heard a howl from that ice-bound region about those appointments? [Renewed applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman desire a reply? [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. WISE. I would say to the gentleman, go read the speech of a Senator of your own party, one of whom I think it is no discourtesy to the gentleman from Maine to say that, in the estimation of the whole country, he was a better man than you are—go read the speech of Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit me—— [Cries of "No!" "No!" "Regular order!"]

Mr. WISE. I say to the gentleman, go and read the speech of Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts. If I mistake not he was the first in the country who declared, some fifteen years ago, that the time had come for peace, and that these memorials of the war should be removed.

The resolution of Mr. Sumner was as follows:

Whereas the national unity and good-will among fellow-citizens can be assured only through oblivion of past differences, and it is contrary to the usage of civilized nations to perpetuate the memory of civil war: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the names of battles with fellow-citizens shall not be continued in the Army Register or placed on the regimental colors of the United States.

Again, mark the contrast between the leader of the Federal Army and the gentleman from Maine. [Renewed applause.] The last words spoken by that great leader on his dying bed at Mount McGregor were that he thanked God that he closed his eyes upon the world believing that peace had returned to a distracted country. [Loud applause.] And yet the halls of legislation are to be annoyed by the sectional tirades of such men as the gentleman from Maine.

I want to say one thing more to the gentleman. We will not permit you to declare it, while we sit here and vote pensions to your officers and your soldiers——

A MEMBER on the Republican side. You do not do it.

Mr. WISE. Go look at the record, and you will find my votes recorded for them. While we vote pensions to your soldiers and the widows of your soldiers——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Our soldiers?

Mr. WISE. Our soldiers.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Ah!

Mr. WISE. Our soldiers! We are in the House of our fathers; and we have come to stay. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, while we are ready and willing to vote pensions to honorably discharged soldiers, who honorably served their country in time of war, we will never consent that it shall be held or proclaimed that one who happened to be in the confederate army is forever debarred from the service of his country. You have no right to establish such a principle; I shall deny your right ever to do so. But I protest that these honorably discharged soldiers of the Union Army shall never again be subjected to the treatment to which they were subjected under the last administration, when men who had fought bravely for the Union were, under a circular bearing the name of WILLIAM MAHONE as chairman, and JAMES D. BRADY, present member from the fourth district of Virginia, as secretary——

Mr. BRADY. The gentleman can not produce any such circular. I challenge him to do so. [Cries of "Sit down!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WISE (continuing). When they were required, under the whip of a master, to give their money for partisan purposes—required like slaves to hold their ballots up, that the boss's minions might see whether they were voting right or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Oh, God! What an attitude in which to place an honorably discharged soldier of the Union—under the whip and the lash of a confederate brigadier. [Renewed and long-continued applause on the Democratic side, the Speaker rapping loudly for order.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has expired.

Mr. WISE. One word more. [Cries of "Order!" and "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HERBERT. Has the whole time allowed for debate expired?

The SPEAKER. The thirty minutes allowed for debate, fifteen minutes on each side, have expired.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask unanimous consent—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BRUMM. Objection can not be made until my request is heard.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order; gentlemen will please resume their seats and cease conversation. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] be extended. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BRUMM. Who objects?

Mr. ROGERS. I object.

The SPEAKER. A great number of gentlemen object. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting the word "and" between "order" and "upon," and by striking out all of the resolution after the words "what authority" and inserting in lieu of the words stricken out the following: "honorable inscriptions have been obliterated, and honorably discharged soldiers or sailors of the United States have at any time been dismissed from the Norfolk navy-yard; and to transmit to this House copies of all correspondence in relation to dismissals or details made by order of the Secretary of the Navy or his immediate predecessor at the Norfolk navy-yard or in the light-house."

The question being taken upon agreeing to the amendment, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 129, noes 3.

The resolution as amended was then adopted.

Mr. HERBERT moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move that the House take a recess till half past 7 o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn has precedence over the motion for a recess.

Mr. HAMMOND. When I moved to adjourn I did not recollect that this was Friday. I withdraw the motion to adjourn and move that the House now take a recess.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion for a recess, the Chair desires to correct a reference. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates for collecting the revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, with a statement of expenses of collections in the several customs districts, was improperly referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department. If there be no objection, that committee will be discharged from its further consideration, and the communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to present at this time a petition, in order that the body of it, without the names, may be printed in the RECORD.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion for a recess, the session of this evening to be devoted to the consideration of pension bills under the standing order of the House.

The motion was agreed to, there being—ayes 119, noes 16.

The SPEAKER (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) At the session this evening the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will preside. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia is agreed to, and the House takes a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7.30 p. m., Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution under which this evening's session is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only be considered.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the special order for this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar under the resolution which has already been read.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES OF THOMAS L. ROSSER.

The first business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3827) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Rosser.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all disabilities imposed upon and incurred by Thomas L. Rosser, of Virginia, by virtue of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, be, and are hereby, removed.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee.

The Clerk read the report, by Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

That Thomas L. Rosser was an officer in the United States Army and resigned therefrom, and was a major-general in the army of the Confederate States. He petitions for a removal of his disabilities, and your committee report a substitute for the bill referred, to remove the same, and recommend its passage.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not rise to make any point in this particular case because of the character of the bill, but I understand our evening sessions were solely for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the resolution under which the House assembles this evening. It is there provided that on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only be considered.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I had not read the order, but supposed it was the same as that adopted at the last Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this bill will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to support or oppose the bill?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. To oppose it. I can not say, Mr. Chairman, I have any particular reason for my opposition to this bill, but I feel called upon as a member of this Congress passing upon the great question of pensions to express my opinions on some subjects which we have been prevented from discussing in this House. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] who is chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions saw fit to-day in his reference to a discussion upon this subject by other members to allude to the fact there were those on this side of the House who had been twenty-odd years ago on a different side of the contest that then raged between the two sections which were at war.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman from West Virginia will allow me to correct him, I suppose?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to say now that I said nothing of that kind either to-day or at any other time. The gentleman is mistaken in the person. I refer him to the RECORD.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The gentleman did not call out by names, but he said to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], when he made a question as to the reference of these pensions, that he ought to have thought of these things long ago, and every man in this House knew and knows to what he referred.

Now I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana that we are here as the representatives of the people, claiming equal honesty, equal patriotism with him, and we challenge him by our votes to go before the people to decide the question whether he is more patriotic or honest than we are.

Mr. EDEN. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to inquire whether general debate is in order under the special order of the House for this evening session to consider pension bills on the Private Calendar and bills for the removal of political disabilities. The gentleman from West Virginia is proceeding to indulge in general debate, and if it is not in order I prefer he should allow us to go on this evening with the special business for which we have been called here and to defer his general discussion to some other time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. EDEN. Yes; I make the point of order that under the resolution adopted by the House for these evening sessions general debate is not in order.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. In the language of Mr. White, I hope this is not to come out of my time. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from West Virginia rose and was recognized to speak to the bill under consideration, and that the same general debate is allowed under the rules as upon other bills in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana that twenty-odd years ago I became a soldier upon what is recognized as "the other side" in this House. Every day up to this time, hour by hour, day by day, and night by night, I have carried the pains and sufferings incurred in that contest. I know what it is to be a soldier; I know what it is to suffer as a soldier, and I thank my God I have the courage to say here that I can lay aside all prejudices and am prepared to stand by those who were the representative soldiers of the Government that now exists in this country. But while the Southern people, who occupied the same position that I did in that regard, are here to vote for pensions, it is unnecessary and uncalled-for on the part of the chairman of the Pensions Committee to make insulting remarks about our course in the past. When in this House did we ever refuse to vote for pensions to Union soldiers who were deserving? Not one single instance can you point your finger to upon the record of this or preceding Congresses, and it was unnecessary and unmanly in the gentleman on his part to refer to us in that manner.

I want to say, sir, that so far as the confederate soldiers are concerned we are here recognizing the courage, recognizing the devotion, recognizing the hardships of the Federal soldiers. We who went into the war on the other side know what you had to suffer. We tasted of the same bitter cup; and while we have no right to appeal to the Government for you, we know that you have the right and the merit. The merit was upon your side, you have a right to appeal, and we are here to aid you in getting what is your due.

What we object to on this question of Federal pensions is that you will not allow us to vote for reasonable pensions. You will not allow us to vote for a bill to pension Union soldiers. You will not allow us to vote for a bill to pension the widows of Union soldiers; but you declare that me must vote for a bill to pension a widow who may marry a soldier from to-day forward as well as those who were the wives of soldiers who died in the service. If you would allow us that amendment to put the widows of Union soldiers upon their merits, there would not be a man on this side of the House that would not vote for it. I appeal to you, who are the advocates of this measure, to know what question of merit, of equity or justice, there is which demands the granting of pensions to women hereafter because at some future time they may marry and become the widows of soldiers who are now entitled to pensions?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from West Virginia is not speaking to the bill before the committee. That question that he now makes will come up after a while, and can be thoroughly discussed when we reach the bill to which it relates. But there are a number of small bills upon the Calendar that we ought to dispose of. We are consuming time in discussing irrelevant questions, and there will be an opportunity for all of these questions to be discussed hereafter. We should endeavor to pass all of the bills upon this Calendar to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have but a word in conclusion. I want to say if the gentlemen who desire to put forward this measure for the pensioning of Union soldiers will only put it in such a sensible, fair, and just shape that we on the other side can vote for it in the discharge of our constitutional duty, I will guarantee to them that there is not a confederate soldier who bears the wounds or scars of battle that I do who will vote against pensioning the soldiers—the Union soldiers of this country.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman from West Virginia misapprehended me, I am sure. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

RHODA DANE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 551) granting a pension to Rhoda Dane.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Rhoda Dane, mother of George W. Dane, late of Company A, Thirty-third Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The beneficiary in this bill applies to the Pension Office for a pension on account of the death of her son, George W. Dane, who was a private in Company A, Thirty-third Indiana Volunteers. He was killed by the enemy under the following circumstances: The soldier had a cousin with whom he had associated ever since his infancy, and this cousin was a member of the Seventieth Indiana Volunteers. They had enlisted about the same time, and had not met since their enlistments. George undertook to visit him, and while going from one regiment to the other was captured by guerrillas and shot. Another brother, and son of this claimant, was killed in front of Atlanta, but he left a widow. These were the only two sons of the claimant, and both lost their lives while in the service of their country. The claim on account of George was rejected on the technical ground that he was not in the line of duty at the time of his death.

The mother is very old and poverty-stricken. The comrades of George testify to his qualities as a soldier, and they describe him as a model in that respect, and say that his weaknesses were his generosity and his bravery. The bereavement that this widow underwent soon after the death of her second son affected her mind, and she fell into a mental stupor, from which she has never recovered. She should under these circumstances be allowed for the remainder of her life the small sum of $8 per month, and we therefore report this bill favorably and ask that it be passed.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM B. KEITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 693) granting a pension to William B. Keith.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William B. Keith, late second lieutenant of Company E, Tenth Regiment Kansas Volunteers, said pension to commence from the date when his name was dropped from said roll.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The claimant enlisted as second lieutenant in Company E, Tenth Kansas Volunteers, August 19, 1861, and was honorably mustered out August 18, 1864. On the 23d of December, 1872, he filed his application for a pension, alleging disability "from bloody piles, the result of diarrhea contracted in camp, in Benton County, Arkansas, October, 1862, after a severe engagement at the battle of Fort Wayne; the diarrhea continuing about two months."

On the 23d of December, 1873, pension was allowed by the Department, but a few months later it was suspended, one Ellis claiming that it was improperly granted, and an investigation by a special examiner was ordered. The evidence shows clearly that a very bitter feeling existed between claimant and certain parties on account of the active part claimant had taken in political contests.

The special examiner seems to have fallen into the hands of these parties and to have made the mistake of supposing that he was sent for the special purpose of preventing claimant from receiving a pension instead of that of making a full and thorough investigation of the case and of ascertaining the exact truth in the matter. The substance of the evidence adverse to claimant seems to be that certain parties had heard claimant complain of piles before entering the service. Not one of the witnesses claimed to know anything further than that claimant had stated at certain times that he was suffering from the piles. On the other hand, a large number of witnesses who were intimate with claimant testify that he was a strong, hearty man, able to do hard labor, and that they never heard him intimate that he was thus afflicted. Dr. Holaday testifies—

"That he was claimant's family physician for years before he enlisted, and knows of his own personal and professional knowledge that when he enlisted he was a sound, healthy man."

Capt. J. F. Broadhead, commanding Company E, says:

"He knows of his own personal knowledge that claimant while in the line of duty, October, 1862, in Benton County, Arkansas, in consequence of a forty-eight hours' forced march, and an engagement with the enemy at Fort Wayne, was taken with diarrhea, from which he suffered for about two months, and which brought on piles."

P. Gould Parker, regimental surgeon of the Tenth Kansas Volunteers, testifies—

"That he knows of his own personal knowledge that claimant, while in the line of duty, October 22, 1862, in Benton County, Arkansas, had been subjected to a forced march of two days and nights, which was followed by the battle of Fort Wayne, when claimant was taken with diarrhea, which continued upon him for about two months and resulted in piles, for which affiant repeatedly prescribed while he continued in the service."

Dr. M. F. Holaday, who had been claimant's family physician before he entered the service, testified that—

"He saw claimant soon after his discharge, in August, 1864, and he was then afflicted with the piles, for which affiant prescribed for him then and has done so repeatedly since; that he has continued to be afflicted with said disease from his discharge to the present time, December 23, 1872, and that he has not aggravated or prolonged said disease by intemperate or other bad habits."

Some of his comrades testify to the same facts. There is no question but what the attempt to deprive him of his pension grew out of political differences, which finally degenerated into bitter personal feuds. But admitting without question all the evidence tending to show that claimant had been at times afflicted with piles prior to enlistment, we cannot see that it affects this case. The evidence is conclusive that he was sound when he enlisted, that the disease did not exist at that time. That the disease for which he now claims pension did originate in the service, and has since continued, is fully and clearly shown. There is, however, very strong evidence to show that the testimony in relation to prior disability is wholly false and malicious.

Your committee, after a very careful examination of the evidence, which is very voluminous, conclude that claimant was unjustly deprived of his pension, and therefore recommend that the title of the bill be amended to read "A bill to restore to the pension-roll the name of William B. Keith," and that the bill be passed.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question in reference to this bill before a vote is taken.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] makes the report in this case.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I believe this bill does not carry the arrearage feature. As I understand it, it is simply to give the benefit for the period during which this party was dropped from the roll.

Mr. MORRILL. That is all. It simply restores the pension.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. M. A. BICKERDYKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 700) granting a pension to Mrs. M. A. Bickerdyke.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. M. A. Bickerdyke, a noted army nurse during the late war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension of $25 per month.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Mrs. M. A. Bickerdike."

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

Among the thousands of noble women who left their homes and loved ones during the dark days of the rebellion to minister like angels of mercy to the sick and wounded soldiers of the Union Army, no one was more widely known or more loved and honored than "Mother Bickerdike." To the soldiers who served in Sherman's army she was a mother and a sister. Wherever she could render aid to, or through her indomitable energy and perseverance obtain succor for, the wounded and the sick she was always the same generous, faithful, and untiring nurse and friend.

Dr. A. Goslin, medical director of the Fifteenth Army Corps, speaks of her services as follows:

"Mrs. M. A. Bickerdike came to me to assist in establishing the Fifteenth Army Corps field hospital on the 9th of June, 1864, at Allatoona Mountain, and continued with me until the 28th of July, when I was ordered to move my hospital to Marietta, Ga. She there assisted me in organizing a hospital to take care of eighteen hundred wounded men that we found lying on the ground without cots or shelter. In this great work I was nobly assisted by Mrs. Bickerdike. I gave her charge of the cooking and laundry departments, and gave her a detail of over one hundred men, and she was fully equal to the occasion. Her services were simply indispensable. I could not have conducted this great hospital without her. Some idea of the work done can be estimated when it is known that from June 9 to October 16, 1864, 5,763 sick and wounded passed through the Fifteenth Army Corps hospital. She worked early and late. She was very strong physically, and seemed to never tire. After her day's work was done in the cooking department she would go into the wards and nurse some poor dying soldier and speak words of comfort to him of home, mother, sister. No wonder she was known in the Army and called by the endearing name of "mother." She was truly a mother to hundreds of sick and dying soldiers. Her services were worth more to General Sherman's army during the Atlanta campaign than any brigadier-general in it."

These are strong and eloquent words of praise, and yet they embrace but a small portion of the time she gave to the suffering soldiers. Through her efforts hundreds of lives were saved and untold suffering alleviated. At the third national convention of the Woman's Relief Corps, held at Portland, Me., in June, 1885, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas Mrs. Mary Bickerdike, the noble army nurse, by her tireless and patriotic devotion to the Union soldier in the field and hospital during four years of the war, has earned the love and reverence of every comrade of the Grand Army; and

"Whereas she is now, at the age of seventy-two, incapacitated for further labor and in needy circumstances and without means of support: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, in national convention assembled, do most earnestly and confidently petition the Congress of the United States of America that they will by special enactment place the name of Mary A. Bickerdike on the pension-roll for the sum of $16 per month for the remainder of her life."

She is now supporting herself by her own labor, doing the laundry work at the United States mint in San Francisco. Notwithstanding her advanced age she still retains her old love for the soldiers who wore the blue, and spends her leisure time in laboring to secure pensions for the poor and needy ones who solicit her assistance. No soldier wounded on the battlefield has a stronger claim on the gratitude of the nation than has this grand old lady. The thousands of brave men who received her kind attention on the battlefields and in the hospitals of the country, and who know of her untiring and effective labors in securing sanitary stores for the sick and wounded, will rejoice to know that her services have been recognized by a liberal pension. The usual pension to army nurses has been $25 per month.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out "fifty," in the fourth line of the bill, and inserting "twenty-five," and that as amended it be passed.

Mr. WOLFORD. I rise to spend a minute or two in opposing one of the amendments reported by the committee; that is, the amendment which proposes to strike out $50 and insert $25. I do not know that in all the reports that ever I read I was more astonished at the conclusion come to by the committee from the facts they presented. In glowing and elegant language—language that reaches the heart—they tell of services indispensable to the country, indispensable to the Army, rendered by day and by night. They tell us of services that could not be done without. And yet they come down after saying all this and tell us, "strike out $50 and give $25."

Sir, this is one of the cases that will not break the Treasury. You may pension this old woman, now seventy-three years of age and who can not live long, at $50 a month, and still enough will be left in the Treasury to pay every member of Congress and all the other servants of the Government. There is no danger of emptying the Treasury. Sometimes men get alarmed and say pensions will break up the Government, but this will not break up the Government.

I want for a minute or two to talk about the unreasonableness of what is here proposed. Here is a woman who, according to the report, has done so much for the country. In her old age she is poor and needs support. The report says she spent the best part of her life with the Army, nursing the sick and talking with the dying in the most lovely language about their sisters and their mothers; and a surgeon of eminence and renown says her services were of more importance to the Army than those of any brigadier-general that went on Sherman's campaign. Who that has ever read the history of the country and knows about that splendid campaign where an amount of skill and valor was shown on both sides that has never been surpassed and seldom equaled, where brigadier-generals were promoted by the hundred for their efficient services—who that has read all this is ignorant of the value of those services? And here is a disinterested observer, a man that loved his country and her officers, who says the services of this woman were greater than those of all those brigadier-generals.

Now, who would think of giving a brigadier-general a pension of $25 a month? Who would think of giving a brigadier-general such a pension as that, or who would think of giving the widow of a brigadier-general such a pension as that? He would be hooted from the halls of Congress if he talked of such a thing. But a higher, grander, and nobler person comes before the committee to-night than any brigadier-general, I care not in what army he served, who, disregarding the delicacy of her sex, walks into perils and dangers and follows our Army and follows our flag amid the hail of balls—for they were shooting boys in Sherman's army.

She followed them in peril and danger and through carnage and blood; and she comes now, not as a warrior but as a mother; as one that loved her race, that loved her country; as one that loved the soldier. She comes and takes charge of a hundred men and prepares the delicacies of life for the wounded soldier. Such a record is a volume in itself. She has charge of a hundred men; she works by day and by night, and furnishes them with all that can soothe them; for she was physically strong, and mentally strong, and morally strong. She was higher than an ordinary patriot. She was a philanthropist of the highest order; she had a bright intelligence; she was a grand woman. And you tell me that that grand woman that made all these sacrifices, that loved your flag so well, and your country so well, and your soldiers so well; one who, after working all day, would go where a dying soldier lay and speak to him in words of comfort and consolation—I gather from the report that she did this every night—and you tell me you will not give her $50, but only $25! This physician says that she did more work than any brigadier-general of the army did.

There are some questions that have two sides to them. I think there are three sides to this question. I venture to say of this great Government that your constituents would be ashamed of you if you were to talk about $50 as too large a recompense for this lady. I will venture the assertion that you may assemble the men and women of America and get them in one great crowd and read to them that report to which we have just listened, and when you come to the last clause, "strike out $50 and insert $25," they will cry shame upon you.

But, sir, there is another side to this question. Here is a poor old woman that has served her country as no brigadier-general could have served it, who has served her country in a way that certainly ought to be encouraged. Fifty dollars a month would be a great thing to her in her old age. Ah! how it would console her heart in her old age to learn that the Government she had sacrificed so much for had remembered her and given her this pension. If it had been $100 a month I would not have opposed it. If it had been $500 I would not have opposed it. But, as I have said, there are three sides to this case.

Another side is this. Looking at it from a moral point of view, can our Government afford, taking the patriot's stand and looking at it as a question of patriotism—can our Government afford to give this woman less than $50 a month? [Laughter.] Looking at the question from the standpoint of the philanthropist and the Christian, can our Government afford to make this pension less than $50 a month? Well, sir, I am not going to talk any more about it, for I am ashamed of talking upon a proposition that must commend itself to the mind and to the heart of every gentleman who reads or hears this report. I do hope, sir, that there will be a unanimous vote of this House and of this committee to-night to make this pension $50 a month. [Applause.]

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I think I ought to say a word in relation to this matter for the satisfaction of my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD]. I do not believe that he wants this woman to have a larger pension than any other nurse, and the pension reported by the committee is the highest that has ever been given to any person for such services. We have fixed the pension in this case at the highest rate. It is very important, we think, to be fair and just in all these matters.

Mr. WOLFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. WOLFORD. Did all the others do what this woman did?

Mr. MATSON. I presume that all the nurses did.

Mr. WOLFORD. Then if they all did what this woman did, for God's sake give them all $50 a month. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATSON. Many of them rendered like services.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the pensioning of this lady was recommended by the Woman's Relief Corps, and that the pension recommended by them was only $16 a month.

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and there were—ayes 42, noes 8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment in regard to the name ought not to pass. The name should be spelled with a "y" instead of an "i," and I ask unanimous consent that it be so spelled all the way through the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, before the bill is laid aside I want to say that I did not oppose the amendment reported by the committee because I recognized the propriety of the general rule applying to all nurses, but I do think it ought to be said with reference to Mother Bickerdyke that her case is almost exceptional, that she stands distinguished as the nurse of nurses during the war, a woman who devoted her life and her services without pay, I think from the beginning of the war to its close; a woman in whom the Grand Army of the Republic from one end of the country to the other are interested; a woman who never discriminated in the charities which she bestowed between the boys in blue and the boys in gray; a woman who went with her lantern upon the battlefield in the night-time and searched out the wounded and the suffering; a woman who stands in a peculiar relation, not only to the soldiers, but also to that great body of women who stood back of her, and who will look to this action of Congress with a peculiar and very tender interest.

The motion of Mr. MORRILL was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PHILIP D. CAMPBELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 698) for the relief of Philip D. Campbell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Philip D. Campbell, late of Company D, Twenty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 698) granting a pension to Philip D. Campbell, submit the following report:

We find that this soldier enlisted August 23, 1864, in Company D, Twenty-second Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was discharged May 24, 1865. Immediately upon his arrival home he complained of an injury to his head, and said that in the battle at Winchester he was knocked from his horse by a blow received from a confederate soldier, and was stepped on by his horse. Soon after reaching home he commenced having epileptic fits, which have continued at short intervals since. Dr. H. S. Chalfant testifies that he was the family physician at the time of enlistment and for years before; that the soldier was a vigorous, robust, hearty young man of twenty years of age, perfectly sound and well, and had never shown any symptoms of epilepsy.

Lieutenant Cross, of same company says "he was a sound, hearty man, always ready for duty." Several witnesses testify that when he came home he complained of his head and acted strangely.

Dr. E. W. Bliss, United States medical examiner, reports in 1881 that he was a confirmed epileptic.

Dr. B. D. Eastman, superintendent of the Kansas State Insane Asylum, testifies "that it appears from the records of that institution that claimant was admitted September 4, 1883; that he had been an epileptic for eighteen years, and that he is evidently a chronic and incurable epileptic, unable to take care of himself."

The man is mentally a complete wreck, is penniless, and has been supported by friends for many years. It is not claimed that he had any fits until after he left the service, and the case was rejected in the Pension Office for that reason. The fact that he entered the service a sound and healthy man and was attacked so soon after leaving the service makes it reasonably certain that the disability was incurred in the service. His condition is a deplorable one. His whole life has been rendered worse than useless by his terrible affliction, and, while the Pension Department can not properly grant him a pension under existing laws, it is a case that appeals strongly to Congress for aid.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment: Add, "And that the pension be paid to the legally constituted guardian of said Campbell for his use and benefit."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to; and then, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN P. DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1468) increasing the pension of John P. Davis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of John P. Davis, late a sergeant of Company H, Twelfth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, from $12 to $72 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 6, strike out "72" and insert "30;" and at the end of the bill add, "said sum to be in lieu of any pension now paid him."

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) was as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1468) granting an increase of pension to John P. Davis, submit the following report:

John P. Davis, late sergeant Company H, Twelfth New Hampshire Regiment, was pensioned at the rate of $12 per month (certificate No. 20583) for gun-shot wound of right forearm. He asks for an increase of pension upon the ground that his subsequent loss of both eyes was consequent upon and directly attributable to said wound. In support of his claim he submits his own statement, duly witnessed, and the sworn statements of Charles O. Davis, F. B. Huntress, and D. B. Nelson, M. D., which are attached as a part of this report. From these it appears that Davis was wounded while in the line of duty at the battle of Gettysburg, July 2, 1863. Through fracture and subsequent gangrene a portion of the ulna of right forearm was lost, with muscular tissues and vessels, permanently crippling that member.

After his discharge, on account of disability, he attempted to do light work at his trade as blacksmith. Dr. Nelson applied a splint to enable him to handle a light hammer, but the splint would get loose and allow his hand to turn. When any twist of the wrist was required in his work he would lose control of his arm, and to his inability to control its movement is attributed the loss of his right eye in May, 1866, from a flying splinter of steel. On November 3, 1867, his left eye was similarly destroyed by a nail which he was striking. The presumption is strong that his loss of sight has indirectly resulted from the wound received in the military service of the United States. We think the circumstances justify an increase of his pension, and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments:

Strike out the words "seventy-two," in the sixth line, and insert the word "thirty," and after the word "act," in the seventh line, insert "said sum to be in lieu of any pension now paid him."

Statement of John P. Davis, late sergeant Company H, Twelfth New Hampshire Volunteers:

To the Congress of the United States:

I enlisted and was mustered into the service of the United States May 15, 1862; was severely wounded while in the line of duty at the battle of Gettysburg, July 2, 1863.

The wound was in the right arm, by a minie-ball, just below the elbow joint, on the inside, severely fracturing one of the bones. Pieces of bone were continually coming away, and gangrene set in, so that great weakness and debility resulted. I was sent home on furlough, and was under the medical care of Dr. D. B. Nelson, of Laconia, N. H., a physician and surgeon of acknowledged skill, who continued to treat my case till September 16, 1863, when I was discharged the service.

After my discharge my arm continued to trouble me, pieces of bone coming out until nearly the whole of the fractured bone had come away. After the flesh had nearly healed, Dr. Nelson made and adjusted a splint, with straps, so that I could use my arm a little in doing light work, and in May, 1866, I tried to work some at my trade as a blacksmith in the car-shops at this place. In attempting to use the hammer the splint would get loose; and the slightest attempt to strike a lateral blow would completely paralyze the muscles of the arm, so that the tool would fall to the floor; and on one of these occasions, in the spring of 1866, a piece of iron flew into the right eye and completely destroyed the sight. On the 3d of November, 1867, the sight of the remaining (left) eye was destroyed in attempting to drive a nail, and since that time I have been totally blind. I am now receiving a pension of $12 per month "for gunshot wound of right forearm," certificate No. 20583. Being totally helpless, as a result of said gunshot wound, I respectfully petition Congress to increase the pension to such sum as will give me an adequate support.

mark.

Signed in presence of—
MARTIN HAYNES,
GEORGE S. CHASE.

I, Charles O. Davis, of Newton, in the State of Massachusetts, on oath depose and say that I am a brother of John P. Davis, of Laconia, in the State of New Hampshire, and know that he was wounded in the right arm while in the service. That I am a blacksmith by trade, and the said John P. Davis is also a blacksmith by trade; that from some time in the winter of 1866 and 1867 till the 1st of November, 1867, both he and I worked in the blacksmith shop of the car company at Laconia aforesaid; that during that period while at work, as aforesaid, he had great trouble with his arm, occasioned by said wound, which was just below the elbow-joint, and it troubled him greatly in his work, particularly in what is called upsetting, or any other work where any twist of the wrist was required. He seemed to lose control of his arm and he would strike at random, and steel and iron would sometimes fly, and I, as well as others, used to remark to him that if he didn't look out he would get his eyes put out, and finally, while he was at work one day in said shop upsetting, his arm gave out and he struck unfair and a shiver or scale of steel flew and struck him in the eye and destroyed the sight. This was the right eye. After the soreness got out of his eye and he became able to work again he came back again into said shop, and we continued to work together until he lost the sight of the other eye, in the first part of November, 1867, by a nail that he was driving flying into it. That I have no pecuniary interest in any claim the said John P. Davis makes for a pension.

CHARLES O. DAVIS.

On this 17th day of November, 1885, personally appeared Charles O. Davis, to me well known, and upon his oath declares that the foregoing statement subscribed by him is true. I further declare that I have no interest in the foregoing claim, and am not concerned in its prosecution.

[SEAL.] ISAAC F. KINGSBURY,
Notary Public, of record at Pension Office.

LACONIA, November 19, 1885.

I, Frank Huntress, on oath depose and say that I am well acquainted with John P. Davis. I am a blacksmith by trade, and was in the shop with John P. Davis from April, 1866, to November, 1867. During that he was troubled with his arm, occasioned by the said wound. He complained of a numbness about the hand and wrist, which would cause him to lose control of his hammer, in consequence of which the steel and iron would be thrown toward his face. Many is the time the remark has been made by him, as well as others, that he must look out or he would lose his eyes. I have no interest in the claim John P. Davis makes for a pension whatever.

F. B. HUNTRESS.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
County of Belknap, ss:

Personally appeared this 19th day of November, 1885, Frank B. Huntress, and made oath that the above affidavit by him signed is true. I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the claim of John P. Davis for pension.

[SEAL.] STEPHEN S. JEWETT, Notary Public.

I hereby certify that I attended professionally John P. Davis, late sergeant Company H, Twelfth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, on the 30th day of July, 1863, and found him suffering from a gunshot wound of right forearm, with gangrene affecting said wound and the entire arm. Fever, restless, pain, and spicula of bone required close attention and nursing for many weeks, recovering very slow, with loss of the middle third of the ulna muscles, tendons, blood vessels, and nerves of outer section of the right forearm, and in July, 1864, I applied a splint to enable him to handle a light hammer at his trade as blacksmith, but which would work loose and allow his hand to turn, and by reason of this disability, in striking an indirect blow, a piece of iron flew into and destroyed the right eye, May, 1866, and on November 3, 1867, in striking a nail it flew into and destroyed the left eye. I attended him in each case with the best of counsel, but the injuries resulted in total blindness.

D. B. NELSON, M. D.

LACONIA, N. H., November 13, 1885.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
Belknap, ss:

On this 1st day of December, A. D. 1885, personally appeared the above-named D. B. Nelson, to me well known, a respectable witness and a physician in good standing, and subscribed and made oath to the foregoing statement before me.

MARTIN A. HAYNES,
Justice of the Peace.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARGARET FLAHERTY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1475) granting a pension to Margaret Flaherty.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, the name of Margaret Flaherty, dependent stepmother of Bartlett Flaherty, late a private in Company F, Thirty-first Maine Volunteers, said pension to commence March 3, 1885.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) was as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 1475, beg leave to submit the following report:

A bill pensioning Margaret Flaherty, the beneficiary in this bill, was passed March 3, 1885, and published with the statutes of the Forty-eighth Congress, second session, page 177, chapter 512. The Interior Department, however, did not feel at liberty to place her name on the pension-roll, on account of a clerical error in the bill, which gave the service of the soldier as in the Third Maine Regiment instead of the Thirty-first. The report, by Mr. Ossian Ray, of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, Forty-eighth Congress, was as follows:

"Bartlett Flaherty enlisted and served as a private in Company F, Third Maine Volunteers, until May 12, 1864, when he was killed, while in the line of duty, at the battle of Spottsylvania Court-House, in Virginia. He was an only son, and contributed between $200 and $300 of his bounty and pay toward the support of his dependent parents, Nicholas and Margaret Flaherty. The soldier's father died several years ago, without obtaining any pension. The mother, Margaret Flaherty, is a widow and very poor, and has applied to the Pension Office for a pension, but her claim was rejected on the ground that she was not the natural mother of the deceased soldier. He was her step-son. She was married to his father when Bartlett Flaherty was an infant, and always acted the part of a true and faithful mother to him."

We recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MATSON. This bill is in the nature of an amendment to an act passed March 3, 1885, for the relief of this woman. The soldier having been described in that act as having served in the Third Maine Regiment instead of the Thirty-first, this bill is designed merely to correct that verbal error.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

THOMAS M. COMMUCK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 646) granting a pension to Thomas M. Commuck.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas M. Commuck, late a private in Company H, Twenty-ninth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 646, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report thereon:

Thomas M. Commuck enlisted as a private in Company H, Twenty-ninth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and was discharged February 20, 1863, on certificate of disability at the general hospital in Helena, Ark. His declaration for pension was filed February 22, 1869, alleging disability by reason of lung disease, and was rejected by the Pension Office on or about March 7, 1885; his application was rejected on the ground "that the disability claimed existed prior to the soldier's enlistment, as shown by the record, and which the non-professional testimony adduced is not of sufficient weight to controvert."

The evidence of claimant and nine other disinterested witnesses shows that claimant prior to his enlistment was a healthy, strong, and able-bodied man, free from any evidence of lung disease or other disability; nor is there any testimony, save the certificate of one physician and the post surgeon at the time of his discharge, going to show that claimant was afflicted with scrofula or any disease prior to his enlistment. It is stated in the certificate of disability by the post surgeon at the hospital where he was discharged that he had been afflicted with scrofula for years prior to his enlistment. A similar statement is made by one Rawson, whose certificate of examination is on file. It is difficult to understand upon what knowledge the post surgeon could make such statement in view of the fact that the soldier was at the general hospital and that the post surgeon had no knowledge of him prior to claimant's being assigned to the hospital in question.

The certificate of Dr. Rawson, whose acquaintance consisted of the medical examination alone, would seem to be based upon equally poor authority. These statements are so overwhelmingly negatived by the testimony of Drs. Floyd, Foster, and Morton, and some twenty-eight other witnesses, that it seems difficult to entertain a doubt of the justice of claimant's application. The undisputed evidence of his comrades and others shows that while claimant and his command were in camp at a point in Mississippi opposite Helena, Ark., and without tents and other shelter, except overcoats and blankets, claimant contracted, during the wet and disagreeable weather then prevailing, a severe cold, which settled on his lungs, and that he was sent to the hospital and treated for lung fever.

The circumstances of his first illness with the regiment are fully set forth by his comrades. His illness was serious, and continued from the time of first going to the hospital until he was discharged from the general hospital at Helena, Ark. Even after his discharge he was confined to his bed for a long period on his way home, and seems from the evidence never to have recovered his health at any time after his discharge. It appears from the record that the claimant's command removed from the vicinity where they were when he was sent to the hospital immediately after his departure. One C. J. Pease signs claimant's certificate of disability, and has signed a certificate also as a commander of his company, which is evidently a mistake of the surgeon in signing his name upon the wrong place upon the certificate, and thereby perhaps securing weight to his statement, as if made by two different persons. It is natural and possible that this error may have influenced the Pension Office originally in the decision of the claim.

The evidence in this case shows conclusively that claimant has been afflicted with his present ailment ever since he was carried to the hospital from his regimental command.

Dr. H. R. Floyd, who made an examination of claimant recently, says:

"He is continually suffering from pain in the lungs, but more especially in the left lung; has intense acute pain in the region of the heart for the last six weeks, and has a peculiar but sickening pain at this point and in the extremities; has severe spells of coughing, producing extreme exhaustion; at some of these spells will expectorate clots of yellow matter, and at other times a greenish yellow purulent substance; has had several severe hemorrhages from the lungs; the first occurred the 12th of August, 1884; had a very severe one on the 1st of December, when the blood gushed out in great quantities, and did not entirely cease for six days; the last severe one occurred the 26th or 27th of December; he is very weak and confined to the bed nearly all the time; at night feels as though he was burning up, though his skin feels cold; this condition is sometimes reversed."

Dr. Floyd states that the examination shows the following objective facts:

"His left lung is very sore, and I had to percuss very lightly, eliciting a cavernous sound over the whole of the upper lobe near the surface; the right lung is not so sore, but the sounds are much the same, but clearer; the chest walls are very much retracted; auscultation reveals cavernous respiration, accompanied with a gurgling sound in both lungs; expansion 1¼ inches. His condition now is such that he can not live very long, and he is so disabled by disease of the lungs as to require the constant aid of another person. He is, in our opinion, entitled to a first-grade rating for disability caused by disease of lungs."

The record in this case shows by a great preponderance of testimony that the soldier's disability was incurred in line of duty, and that prior to his enlistment he was free from disease. The continuance of his disability is traced clearly down to the present time.

The abundant tributes, by affidavits and otherwise, to the merits of his claim, both from his neighbors and distinguished gentlemen of his State; his evident high character and integrity, as evidenced by the record; his sufferings and probable speedy death by reason of entering the service of his country, combine to demand at the hands of your committee the just recognition which a grateful nation is and should ever be willing to accord to her defenders. Your committee return the bill with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

DANIEL B. CLARK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 414) granting a pension to Daniel B. Clark.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Daniel B. Clark, late of Company A, First Ohio Cavalry, now residing in Fandon, McDonough County, State of Illinois, and pay him a pension at the rate of thirty dollars per month.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill strike out the words "at the rate of thirty dollars per month" and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The report (by Mr. NEECE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 414, beg leave to submit the following report:

Daniel B. Clark enlisted in Company A, First Regiment of Ohio Cavalry, and was discharged at Nashville, Tenn., for disability, September 17, 1864. He was a prisoner of war from August 29, 1862, to September 13, 1862. A pension is claimed for heart disease and piles contracted while a prisoner of war. The evidence is as follows: Simon Dorran, a private of the same company and regiment, and also a fellow-prisoner, testifies said Clark had diarrhea and piles while he was a prisoner of war. Capt. Noah Jones, who was the captain of Clark's company, also William P. Cleaveland, a member of said company, both testify that Clark, after he returned from prison, was unable to do duty on account of disease or disability, which disease they understood Clark contracted while a prisoner of war. Dr. Milton Dunlap, of Greenfield, Ohio, testified that he treated said Clark in 1862, but he can not now remember for what disease. It also appears that after Clark was a prisoner of war he returned to his home near Greenfield, Ohio, on furlough. John Blain testifies that Clark was a sound man at the time of enlistment; that he was at Clark's home in Ross County, Ohio, in 1862; that Clark was at home sick, and complained of pain in his breast, and that at that time Dr. Dunlap treated him.

Dr. W. H. Wear testifies that he met said Clark in 1865, and had frequent talks with him about his trouble, and that Clark at the time was suffering from heart disease, pleuritis, and piles; and that since 1872 he has been said Clark's family physician, and has treated him for said diseases, and that said diseases still continue, and that said Clark is totally disabled. Dr. McDavit testifies that he treated said Clark in 1880 for heart disease and pleuritis. Dr. Compton says he knows said Clark, and that he treated him since 1872 frequenty for heart disease and piles.

Dr. A. F. Eidson testifies that he treated said Clark from August, 1865, to April, 1871, for heart disease and piles. The board of medical examiners who examined him in 1881 say he is totally disabled from the effects of heart disease and piles. A number of witnesses testify to Clark's soundness at the time of his enlistment, and to his being sick ever since he was a prisoner of war. Evidence introduced before the committee show said Clark to be totally disabled at this time, confined to his bed or invalid-chair, and unable to walk, or to talk so he can be understood without great difficulty.

Your committee recommend that said bill do pass, with the following amendment: Strike out the words "at the rate of thirty dollars per month" and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ALEXANDER P. STEWART.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3846) to remove the disabilities of Alexander P. Stewart, of La Fayette County, Mississippi.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all disabilities imposed upon and incurred by Alexander P. Stewart, of La Fayette County, in the State of Mississippi, under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The report (by Mr. TUCKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was refered bill H. R. 1318, beg leave to report:

Alexander P. Stewart, in his petition, states the facts on which he asks to have his disabilities removed.

Your committee report a substitute for the bill referred and recommend its passage.

CHANCELLOR'S OFFICE, UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI,
Oxford, December 19, 1885.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

The petition of Alexander P. Stewart, of the State of Mississippi, respectfully sets forth:

That he graduated from the Military Academy at West Point in 1842; was appointed second lieutenant in the Third Artillery; resigned in 1845, and engaged in private pursuits. In the year 1861 he entered the military service of the Confederate States, in which he served during the war of secession as a brigadier, major, and lieutenant-general in their armies. Soon after the war he was pardoned by the President and took the oath required in such cases.

He asks that the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States be removed.

Respectfully submitted.

ALEX. P. STEWART.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. MORGAN. In reference to this case of General Stewart I desire to state that at the close of the war and before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment he was granted a full pardon, and took what is commonly known as the amnesty oath. He was under the impression that by reason of this fact he did not come within the provisions of the fourteenth amendment. Recently he has learned that gentlemen for whose opinions he has the highest respect think differently. This is the reason why the application in his case has been so long delayed.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I will ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether he expects this gentleman will receive a pension?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this bill has already been laid aside.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. But the Chair certainly would not lay aside a bill without an opportunity for inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MORGAN] rose the Chair had asked for objections, and there being none, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I do not suppose that the Chair intended to be arbitrary. It would be better for us to inquire into these matters. I desire to ask whether the passage of this bill puts this gentleman on the pension-roll.

Mr. MORGAN. My statement in reference to this case was made for the reason that some gentlemen on the floor drew my attention to the fact that the application in this case had been delayed some twenty years. I therefore thought it proper, in justice to General Stewart, that the reason of this delay should appear.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. But that does not answer the question.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state to the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MORGAN] and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] that they are both out of order. The Clerk will report the next bill.

EDWARD G. W. BUTLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4409) to remove the disabilities of Edward G. W. Butler, of Missouri.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all disabilities imposed upon and incurred by Edward G. W. Butler, of Missouri, by virtue of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, be, and are hereby, removed.

The report (by Mr. TUCKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 987, beg leave to report:

The petition of Edward G. W. Butler sets forth the facts on which he claims a removal of disabilities.

The committee report a substitute for the bill referred, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

NANCY L. RIBBLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16) granting a pension to Nancy L. Ribble.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to put the name of Nancy L. Ribble on the pension-roll, and grant her a pension as dependent mother of George W. Ribble, late a private in Company K, Nineteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, who died in the service and in line of duty; the said pension to be subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 16, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report as follows:

The beneficiary in this bill had no children of her own. In 1844 her sister died, leaving two infant children, one aged two years, the other six months. She nurtured and educated both of these children, and they lived with her and her husband and assumed the name of Ribble, their real names being Shafer. Both enlisted in Company K, Nineteenth Indiana Volunteers, on the 29th day of July, 1861, George, the older, being then in his nineteenth year, and Andrew, the younger, then in his seventeenth year. George died of small-pox in the District of Columbia on the 12th day of January, 1862, while in the service. Andrew was severely wounded through the lungs in the battle of Antietam and never recovered therefrom, and died shortly after his discharge.

Mrs. Ribble and her husband were at the time they took these children, and have been ever since, poor people; but, as shown by the testimony of respectable witnesses, have at all times maintained good characters for honesty, integrity, and patriotism. Letters from the two soldiers are exhibited, showing that during their service they contributed a portion of their pay to the support of their foster parents. They had expected to lean upon these two men in their old age, whom they had nurtured and educated so that they might expect to be able to do so, and whose affections they commanded, as shown by their letters. They were to all intents and purposes the children of this woman, who is now old, feeble, and helpless. The father of the two soldiers has been dead many years, and was never pensioned on account of the death of either.

Under these circumstances this committee do not hesitate to ask for the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ALEXANDER HARPER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 758) granting a pension to Alexander Harper.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alexander Harper, late of Company I, First Regiment West Virginia Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 758) granting a pension to Alexander Harper, submit the following report:

We find that this soldier enlisted in Company I, First Regiment West Virginia Volunteers, May 21, 1861, and was discharged August 27, 1861. On the 3d of July, 1876, he made application for a pension, alleging that about August 1, 1861, "he contracted measles, which has caused weak lungs and breast."

J. L. Harper and Nancy A. Wiley testify that—

"He was a young man, stout and healthy, when he enlisted; when he returned home he was quite sick, and has gradually grown worse. His disease was lung disease, with cough. He was attended by Doctor McBath from the date of his return until he went West. The doctor has since died."

Capt. B. W. Chapman, commanding the company, testifies that:

"Claimant, in July or August, 1861, at Rowlesburg, Va., contracted measles. There was no doctor present and I sent him to the hospital at Grafton. I saw him in said hospital and found that he had not been properly attended to and had contracted camp fever, and at date of his discharge was suffering with measles and camp fever; that up to date of contracting the measles he was free from disease of all kinds."

February 2, 1878, Dr. J. M. Garrett testifies "that he has been claimant's family physician since 1865;" that "at that time (1865), or about that time, he examined the said Alexander Harper, and found him suffering from congestion of the lungs and pain and weakness in the chest, which he learned was the sequel to an attack of measles contracted while in the Army; and he further states that above disability has continued down to the present time, and that the above-named Alexander Harper has not at any time been an able-bodied man or free from the disability above described during the period above stated."

The postmaster of Troy, Iowa, states that—

"The reputation of Dr. J. M. Garrett in this community for truth is of the highest order; no man stands higher."

Joseph Harper testified that—

"Claimant came back from the three-months' service sick with the measles, and lay sick in Hancock County, West Virginia, for three months before he could be moved."

Dr. William Craig, United States examining surgeon at Keosauqua, Iowa, reports September 16, 1881:

"This applicant is suffering from the effects of measles, resulting in bronchitis. I find him with a hacking cough and irritation of the bronchial tubes extending into the lungs."

The case was rejected in the Pension Office because there was no hospital record, and the claimant was unable to furnish medical evidence of treatment in service or at discharge. The surgeon in charge of the hospital says he has no record and is unable to remember the cases he treated. Dr. McBath, whom it is shown treated him when he came out of the service, is dead, so it is impossible for claimant to comply with the requirements of the Department. It is proven beyond question that he contracted measles in the Army, and from the want of care and proper treatment camp-fever followed; that while sick his term of service expired and he was discharged; that for three months after his discharge he was unable to be moved to his home; that Dr. McBath treated him during this illness; that from 1865 to 1878 he was a constant sufferer from lung disease, and that in 1881 and 1884 the disease still continued. It would be unreasonable to presume that his present condition is not the result of his army service. The case is an unusually strong one.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

AUGUST SCHINDLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 802) granting a pension to August Schindler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of August Schindler, late a private in Company A, One hundred and ninety-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 802) granting a pension to August Schindler, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted August 30, 1864, in Company A, One hundred and ninety-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was mustered out June 4, 1865. March 24, 1880, he made application for a pension, "alleging that in December, 1864, he caught cold, resulting in diabetes." This application was rejected in 1882, on the ground that there was no record of the alleged disability, and the claimant was unable to furnish satisfactory proof of its origin in service. In the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress a bill was referred to this committee, upon which an adverse report was made on account of the lack of evidence to sustain the claim. Additional affidavits have since been filed which very materially strengthen the case. Edwin A. Kratz, of the same company, testifies:

"He and I were tent-mates, and marched together in camp and field, and fought side by side from the middle of August, 1864, till March 29, 1865; that he appeared to be sound and healthy, and I believed him to be so (except being near-sighted, necessitating the wearing of glasses) until early in December, 1864, when, on General Warren's raid down the Weldon Railroad (our regiment being in the Fifth Corps), and after marching through the rain and mud a day or two he commenced complaining of his back giving out, and we two dropped to the rear near the evening of the second or third day, but caught up again the next day. For several days after the raid and at intervals afterward he was troubled with pains in the small of his back. After the Hatcher's Run fight, in February, 1865, the pains were so severe that he was scarcely able to perform camp duty, and I noticed that his urine was of very high color and had to be voided frequently. Rubbing his back seemed to give temporary relief, which I did for him, especially after exposure to wet weather, and after coming off of picket duty during February and March, 1865."

John Sheridan testifies that he was sergeant of Company A, One hundred and ninety-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was well acquainted with claimant; that claimant, after several days of exposure, complained of pains in his back and limbs, and that he took him to the regimental surgeon, who gave him medicine, saying he was exhausted and ought to have rest; that deponent was absent from the company for about thirty days, and when he returned he found claimant still debilitated and unfit for duty, and he remained so until he was discharged, and that he continued under the treatment of the surgeon. He further says that "claimant was as brave a soldier as I ever met."

Godfried H. Vogt says he knew claimant for years before he enlisted as a hale hearty man, and that upon his arrival home in 1865 he was a wreck of his former self, and complained of rheumatism and kidney disease. Joseph Hacker and Andrus Friedly testify that he was well when he enlisted, and came home sick and continued so for two years and until he moved away. Dr. A. Antony testifies to treating him for diabetes in 1869, and Drs. C. Ruttger and A. N. Breneman from 1874 to 1876. The examining surgeon at Garnett, Kans., reports in 1882 that he is badly affected. He is now unable to do any manual labor, is very poor, with a large family to support.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN C. CLARK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4410) for the relief of John C. Clark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to readjudicate the pension claim of John C. Clark, late a private in Company A, Thirtieth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, as though the application under which said pension was granted had been filed on the 20th of June, 1880.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 780) for the relief of John C. Clark, submit the following report:

This bill asks that John C. Clark be allowed arrears of pension from January 1, 1863, to July 1, 1882, at the rate of $4 per month, that being the rate of pension allowed him by the Pension Department, commencing at the date last named. In support of this he claims that on or about the 20th of June, 1880, he made out an application in proper form, which was duly witnessed and attested, and placed it in the United States mail; that afterward he received the usual circular letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, acknowledging the receipt of the application and giving the number under which it had been entered in the Pension Department, but that he has since lost that letter; that afterward, upon making inquiry, he was informed that no application for pension from him was on file, and he accordingly made a new one. Claimant shows that A. W. Hoyt made application at the same time and received a similar letter, a copy of which is hereto given. Affidavits of A. W. Hoyt, J. W. White, and claimant are as follows, the credibility of the witnesses being strongly vouched for by Hon. S. R. PETERS, a member of this House:

Affidavit of J. C. Clark.

STATE OF KANSAS,
County of Rice, ss:

J. C. Clark, being first duly sworn according to law, says that he is thirty-nine years of age, and resides in Lyons, Kans.; that in the month of June, 1880, he made his application for a pension; that as early as the 20th day of said June, 1880, and possibly several days earlier, J. W. White, the attorney who prepared said application, informed affiant that said application had been duly mailed to the Pension Department at Washington, and affiant further says that some two or three months after making such application, and in about the month of September, 1880, he received a letter from the Hon. J. A. Bentley acknowledging the receipt of said application, said letter being quite similar in form to the one attached by A. W. Hoyt to his affidavit made this day in relation to this matter.

And affiant further says that he remembers clearly of a conversation with the said Hoyt at about the time of receiving said letter, in which affiant remarked and stated to the said Hoyt that said letter was received, and in said conversation it was stated that both of said applications were evidently received in due time, and it was also stated that the Department had been a long while in acknowledging receipt, and which was talked over as probably being on account of the Department being somewhat behind in its work. And affiant further says that said letter so received from the Department has in some manner been lost and can not be found, though diligent search has been made. That at the time of making said application affiant was in business in Lyons, and that in 1881 he moved to Missouri, and went into business there, and afterward returned to Lyons, and that it is his belief that said letter was lost during such moving, or was thrown into the waste basket by some of the clerks or the book-keeper as being of no value.

J. C. CLARK.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 20th day of May, 1884; and I hereby certify that said Clark is a man of respectability, a man of truth and veracity, and is entitled to full faith and credit in each every statement by him as aforesaid made, and that I have no interest, either direct or indirect, in this claim or application or in its results.

S. J. SMITH,
Clerk District Court, Rice County, Kansas.

Affidavit of J. W. White.

STATE OF KANSAS,
County of Rice, ss:

J. W. White, being first duly sworn according to law, says that he resides in Lyons, Kans., and is a lawyer by profession. That he remembers of his own personal knowledge that in the month of June, 1880, as attorney for John C. Clark, who was a private in Company A, Thirtieth Illinois Infantry, that he made out an application for a pension for the said Clark, and prepared other papers by way of affidavits in blank for certain witnesses to fill up and execute; and affiant says that about the same time he was also acting as attorney for one A. W. Hoyt in aiding him in securing a pension, and that he prepared papers at about the same time for the said Hoyt. And affiant further says that not later than the 18th or 20th of June, 1880, and possibly a week earlier, he placed in the post-office at Lyons, Rice County, Kansas, two envelopes duly addressed to the Pension Department, at Washington, D. C., postage prepaid, and that one of said envelopes contained the application of the said A. W. Hoyt, with perhaps some other papers in relation thereto in the way of affidavits and a letter addressed to the Commissioner of Pensions, and that the other envelope contained the application and affidavit of the said J. C. Clark, made out in due form and duly signed by the necessary witnesses and by them duly sworn to the contents thereof, and together with said application of the said Clark was a letter addressed to the Commissioner of Pensions in relation to said application. Both of said letters were so mailed on the same day, and affiant remembers that at the time of the making out of said applications, and on the very day they were so mailed, the question of the law being about to expire at an early day was talked over, and it was then stated that said letters had more than ample time to reach Washington before the 1st of July, 1880; and affiant says that it was at least ten days or two weeks before the expiration of the arrears-of-pension act. Since making affidavit some two months ago concerning this matter, affiant says that he has refreshed his memory by examining papers and letters, and from such can state positively in relation to the time of said mailing of said letters.

Affiant further says that some six weeks or two months after the mailing of said application, as stated, he received a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions acknowledging the receipt of the said Hoyt's application, and in about two weeks after receiving such letter as to the said Hoyt's application being duly received this affiant received a similar letter acknowledging the receipt by the Commissioner of Pensions of the said Clark's application. Said letter was not preserved for the reason that affiant did not consider at the time that it would ever be of any service, supposing said application had been duly received in ample time, and was properly filed and a record made thereof. And affiant further says, that he knows, of his knowledge, that the said Clark also received a similar letter from the Pension Department about the same time that said affiant received the one mentioned, he, the said Clark, having shown such letter to affiant in conversation at about that time. Said pension claim was not prosecuted to a final determination during that year of 1880 or 1881, for the reason that a very important witness could not be found or his address discovered. That in 1882 the said Clark removed to Missouri, and, as affiant is informed, he, the said Clark, through the advice of counsel, made another application, and not until the fall of 1883 was this affiant ever informed that no record could be found in the Pension Department of said original application so made in June, 1880; and this affiant further says, that he has no interest either in the result of this claim or application of the said Clark further than an ordinary attorney in seeing that justice be done an old soldier, and that he has not made any charge for what he has done, and expects no remuneration.

J. W. WHITE.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 20th day of May, 1884, and I hereby certify that the said J. W. White is a respectable citizen, and is a man of truth and veracity, and is entitled to full faith, confidence, and credit upon each and every allegation contained in the foregoing affidavit.

S. J. SMITH,
Clerk District Court, Rice County, Kansas.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
August 20, 1880.

SIR: The claim of A. W. Hoyt, of Company M, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery, No. 378,269, for pension, has been received, and will be examined in its order, and the result communicated to you. In any communication you may find it necessary to address to the office relative to this or any other claim, please indorse on each piece of evidence the full name and service of the soldier, and the number and character (whether invalid, increase, &c.) of the claim.

Very respectfully,

JAS. BENTLEY,
Commissioner.

Affidavit of A. W. Hoyt.

STATE OF KANSAS,
County of Rice, ss:

A. W. Hoyt, being first duly sworn according to law, says that he is fifty-two years of age; resides in Lyons, Kans., and has so resided for over six years, and by occupation at present a dealer in agricultural implements. And affiant further says that he is well acquainted with J. C. Clark, and has been so acquainted with him for six years last past; that he knows of his own personal knowledge that the said J. C. Clark, in the month of June, 1880, made his application for pension, this affiant having seen the said Clark's affidavit and application and read the same. And affiant further says that he was sergeant in Company M, Eighth United States Heavy Artillery, and that in said month of June, 1880, this affiant also made application for a pension, and that his said application was prepared by J. W. White, attorney at Lyons, he being the same attorney who prepared the application of the said J. C. Clark; and affiant says that of his own personal knowledge he knows that the said White, on a day not later than the 20th day of June, 1880, and possibly some days earlier, left his office professing to go to the post-office for the purpose of mailing affiant's application, together with that of the said J. C. Clark. And affiant says that he has good reason to believe, and does believe, that both of said applications were on said day duly addressed and placed in the post-office at Lyons by the said White.

Affiant further says that his application, which was and is No. 378269, was duly received by the Pension Department, and that he has received his pension thereon, the certificate being No. 244014. And affiant further says that since making an affidavit some two months ago in relation to this matter, he has examined his letters and papers received from the Pension Department, and refreshed his memory in relation to said date of mailing of said application, and that he is well satisfied that said applications were mailed as early as stated herein, and that he remembers of a conversation had by and between himself and the said Clark and White, in which it was talked over and stated at about the time of mailing said applications that they were mailed in ample time to reach the Department, and several days to allow for any possible delays in the mails, barring uncontrollable casualties and accidents.

And affiant further says that in the month of August, 1880, he received a letter from the Hon. J. A. Bentley, Commissioner, acknowledging receipt of affiant's application, and which letter was the first communication received in relation thereto; that about two weeks after the receipt of said letter, and which is hereto attached and made a part hereof, he, this affiant, had a conversation in the city of Lyons with the said Clark, in which he, Clark, said he had just received a similar letter acknowledging receipt of his application by the said Bentley, and the said Clark then and there held in his hand an envelope showing on its face that it was from the Pension Office, and appeared to contain a letter, but which letter affiant did not read, and it was then and there stated by and between affiant and said Clark that both of their applications had evidently been received in proper time for due consideration by the Department. And affiant further says that he has no interest, either direct or indirect, in the result of the said Clark application.

A. W. HOYT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 20th day of May, 1884; and I hereby certify that the said A. W. Hoyt is a man of respectability, and entitled to full credit and belief as to each and every statement contained in the foregoing affidavit, and that I have no interest, either direct or indirect, in the result of said Clark's application or claim.

S. J. SMITH,
Clerk District Court, Rice County, Kansas.

The evidence seems conclusive. Cases have occasionally occurred where applications have been lost or mislaid in the Department, and your committee recommend the passage of the following substitute:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to readjudicate the pension claim of John C. Clark, a private in Company A, Thirteenth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, as though the application under which said pension was granted had been filed on the 20th of June, 1880.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I am personally cognizant of this case and of the parties who make the affidavits in it. The affidavit of Mr. Clark is supported by J. W. White, now a State senator, and also by A. W. Hoyt. All the witnesses are personally known to me to be reputable men. This bill passed the House at the last session, but too late to pass the Senate. The same evidence has been presented at this session.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The reason why I called for the reading of the report was to see what were the state of facts the committee acted on in making this exception to the rule which has been so long adopted here of allowing no arrears. I see the ground upon which it is based is that the committee were satisfied the application was actually filed.

Mr. PETERS. That is so.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That being so, the claimant should stand on the same ground as if there had been no failure of duty on the part of the officials in the loss of the papers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DR. J. F. BRUNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 702) granting a pension to Dr. J. F. Bruner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Dr. J. F. Bruner, late assistant surgeon of the Seventh Regiment of Missouri Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 702) granting a pension to Dr. J. F. Bruner, submitted the following report:

We find that claimant was mustered into service May 11, 1862, as assistant surgeon of Seventh Missouri Cavalry, and resigned on account of ill health February 12, 1863. January 20, 1881, he made an application for a pension, alleging "that he contracted chronic laryingitis and bronchitis by exposure in marching to and at the battle of Prairie Grove, Ark., December 6, 7, and 8, 1862; that he was taken prisoner on the 7th, and suffered great exposure, and his disability assumed a chronic form in consequence of his continued arduous duty in caring for the sick after said battle, and finally rendered him unfit for duty, so that he was compelled to resign."

His application for pension was rejected on account of the statement made in his letter of resignation, giving as a reason for his leaving the service—

"On account of my own health, which has been gradually and certainly failing for the past two months, originating from a return of my former disease, 'chronic bronchitis,' combined with dyspepsia, which, acting on a system constitutionally feeble, has rendered me so diseased and debilitated that I am satisfied I am wholly unfit for future service."

Claimant, in an affidavit filed July 9, 1884, says that when he wrote the letter of resignation the statement that a former disease, "chronic bronchitis," had returned was not intended to convey the idea that he was affected with such disease in any manner or form prior to nor at time of enlistment. That he then was and had been for a number of years a sound, able-bodied man.

Dr. Joseph Malin, an old and well-known physician of Saint Joseph, testifies that he was intimately acquainted with claimant for several years prior to his enlistment, and to the best of his recollection claimant was sound at enlistment; that he had opportunities of knowing it had it been otherwise, as he was intimately acquainted with him and lived in the same town.

Hon. JAMES N. BURNES, a member of this House, testified that he knew claimant from 1850 until several years after the war; was a stout, hearty man, apparently free from any disease; had no trouble of the lungs or throat to deponent's knowledge, and that claimant's moral character was unexceptionable in every respect.

A large amount of evidence from parties in good standing, some of them claimant's comrades and intimate associates, has been filed to show that claimant was in good health when he entered the service.

Dr. W. Bertram testifies that himself and Dr. Jones were on the United States examining board for examining conscripts in 1864, and that claimant was examined by them and given a certificate of disability on account of bronchitis, and was only fit for the invalid corps, and that he consulted with claimant at various times afterward as to his disease, which continued to trouble him. The evidence is conclusive that he has suffered from said disease ever since and is now in a very critical condition.

Rev. D. L. Lander testifies that he was, in August, 1882, in a condition of absolute need.

Three special examiners have carefully investigated the case, and all reported strongly in favor of allowing the claim. The examiner in charge of the case in the Pension Office submitted it to the board of review with the recommendation that it be allowed, in which your committee most heartily concur. Putting the most unfavorable construction possible on the language of the resignation, it would only show that at some prior time the doctor had been afflicted with bronchitis, and that he had a weak constitution. But admitting this, with care and a careful avoidance of unnecessary exposure he might have enjoyed comparatively good health. That he served in the field and hospitals for eight months; that he suffered three days of exposure on the battlefield of Prairie Grove, and that under this severe strain he broke down, is clearly and conclusively established by a large number of trustworthy witnesses. Had he been a stronger man he might have endured more, but all that he had he gave to his country.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ANNA D. W. EICHMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 602) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna D. W. Eichman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Anna D. W. Eichman, of Dubuque city, Iowa, widow of Nicholas Eichman, late second sergeant of Company G, Sixteenth Regiment of Iowa Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 602) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna D. W. Eichman, having given the same due consideration, beg leave to report:

Nicholas Eichman, husband of claimant, was mustered into the United States service September 27, 1861, in Company G, Sixteenth Iowa Volunteer Infantry; was wounded at the battle of Shiloh, April 6, 1862, by gunshot wound in left leg and shell wound in right foot, by which he was totally disabled and for which he was honorably discharged August 15, 1862. For this disability he was placed on the pension-roll April 20, 1863, at rate of $8 per month, and was borne on the roll continuously until date of his death, July 18, 1883.

His widow, Anna D. W. Eichman, filed her application for pension December 17, 1883.

Requisite proofs of marriage, number of children, and that neither party was previously married, were duly filed; also following affidavit of Dr. Frederick Netzuhe as to cause of husband's death, dated January 10, 1884:

"That I have been the family physician of Nicholas Eichman for many years, during which time I have frequently attended to him on account of rheumatism, caused by the wounds in his foot, which wound became closed; also attended Mr. Eichman for the same in early part of July, 1883, at which time the rheumatism passed to his lungs and caused his death, the closing of the wound driving the rheumatism to his lungs."

Also March 11, 1884:

"I have been the family physician of the late Nicholas Eichman since the year 1870, and have during that period, during every year, treated him for an open wound in his right foot, received by him at the battle of Pittsburgh Landing, and also for rheumatism, as well as asthmatic difficulties and shortness of breath. In 1874 I found that the deceased, Mr. Eichman, was particularly affected with rheumatism whenever the wound in his foot closed, and was compelled to keep said wound open and promote the serous secretions from the same and avoid the difficulties above named. The cause of his death was undoubtedly the close of the wound in the foot, in addition to which he had contracted a severe cold, all of which caused a serous discharge in the lungs (pneumonia), which caused his death. Have thought for many years that Mr. Eichman's death would be hastened by that wound, and firmly believe that same was the full cause of his death."

Claim was rejected April 24, 1884, because "remote cause of death not medically shown."

Case was resubmitted December 9, 1884, and the following affidavit of Dr. Nitzuhe filed, dated November 21, 1884:

"I, F. Robert Nitzuhe, being duly sworn, upon oath depose and say that I have been a practicing physician and surgeon for over thirty years, that I live in the city of Dubuque, Iowa, and am fifty-five years of age; that since 1870 I have been the family physician of said Nich. Eichman, deceased, and that I have repeatedly (almost every year) treated said Nich. Eichman for an ulceration of the foot, being the result of a gunshot wound received in the service of the United States of America, for rheumatism, and dyspnœa.

"As long ago as 1874 I found that Nicholas Eichman was especially subject to the rheumatic and asthmatic affections above mentioned, when the ulceration of the foot aforesaid (the effect of said gunshot wound) ceased and healed.

This circumstance compelled me on various occasions, for the purpose of removing said affections and relieving the patient, to reopen said wound and thus promote the serous discharge of the diseased extremity, which serous discharge had been retained in the system and become the cause of the affections above named.

A similar state of circumstances, culminating in the death of said Eichman, again occurred shortly prior thereto.

The ulceration of the foot had healed, and this circumstance (possibly aided by a slight cold) caused the serous secretions, which otherwise were discharged from the system through the ulceration, the gunshot wound aforesaid, to accumulate in the lungs, and this laying the foundation for and being the direct cause of a serous pneumonia, from which Nich. Eichman died on the 18th day of July, 1883.

I desire further to say, that being more conversant with and fluent in the German than in the English language, I prepared a statement in German to guide the party preparing the original affidavit, which I subscribed and which is now on file in the Department. That in subscribing to the same I took it for granted that it was a correct translation of my statement. I find upon careful perusal that the statements contained in foregoing affidavit are the statements which it was my intention to incorporate in my first affidavit, and that the same are a true and correct translation of my original statement in German; and I further say that if affidavit on file in the Department differs materially in any regard from the foregoing, the former affidavit is erroneous, and that such mistake occurred through oversight on my part and the innocent error of the translator.

I further say that I was informed by said Nicholas Eichman in his lifetime that the gunshot wound (ulceration) before referred to as the direct cause of the serous pneumonia resulting in his death, was the same disability for which said Eichman was drawing pension from the Government at the time of his death; and, also, that I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the prosecution of the pending claim for widow's pension. I also state, that not being sufficiently conversant with the English language to reduce my statements to writing myself in a proper manner, this has been done by W. G. Joerus, esq., at my request, and I have by a personal examination assured myself that all of the foregoing statements are correct.

F. ROBERT NITZUHE, M. D.

Was again rejected January 7, 1885, for same reason as before.

The apparent conflict in the testimony of Dr. Nitzuhe is clearly explained in his last affidavit, and was evidently an error in translation. His testimony as to cause of death is positive; his statement of the case as to condition of wound, &c., is fully corroborated by all the biennial medical examinations since pension was first granted.

The soldier suffered for over twenty years with, and finally died of, wounds received in battle. His wife has faithfully and tenderly nursed him during all these years. She and her children are now in want.

Your committee believe she should be placed on the pension-roll, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN DEFENBAUGH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 634) granting a pension to John Defenbaugh.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of John Defenbaugh, late a private in Company K, Eighty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, now a resident of Creston, Iowa, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and requirements of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 631) granting a pension to John Defenbaugh, having given the same due consideration, beg leave to report:

John Defenbaugh, late private of Company K, Eighty-second Pennsylvania Volunteers, applied for pension for alleged wound in right hip by a piece of bursting shell, received in battle of Sailor's Creek, about 3 o'clock p. m. of April 6, 1865.

The only proof of wound in service is claimant's own affidavit; and he further swears that his captain was at that time absent on furlough; that the only lieutenant with the company was killed—shot down by his side in same battle; that his wound at that time seemed so slight that he did not go to hospital, and only showed it to one comrade, who has since died; that he was soon thereafter, with his regiment, mustered out of the service, to wit, July 13, 1865.

For above reasons he is unable to furnish the proof of incurrence in service in line of duty required by the rulings of the Pension Office. His claim was, in consequence, rejected. It is, however, clearly proven by competent lay and medical testimony that he has suffered continuously since his muster-out with said wound, which has grown constantly worse, and that from said wound, on the 20th day of October, 1880, there was taken a fragment of an iron shell, which is now on file in Pension Office with proofs of extraction; that he is by reason of same permanently disabled and utterly helpless.

We are of the opinion that the affidavit of John Defenbaugh, with the abundant corroborating testimony, fully establishes his right to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLOTTE D. CROCKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 650) granting an increase of pension to Charlotte D. Crocker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Charlotte D. Crocker, widow of Brig. Gen Marcellus M. Crocker, from $30 to $50 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 650, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

Mrs. Charlotte D. Crocker is now receiving a pension of $30 per month as the widow of Brig. Gen. Marcellus M. Crocker, deceased, who entered the service at the first call of his country in 1861 as major of the Second Iowa Volunteers; was soon promoted to lieutenant-colonel of that regiment, and on December 30, 1861, to the colonelcy of the Thirteenth Iowa. This regiment was brigaded under the order of General Grant, after the battle of Shiloh, with the Eleventh Iowa, the Fifteenth Iowa, and the Sixteenth Iowa, and this brigade was known as the Iowa Brigade of the Seventeenth Army Corps, commanded by the lamented General McPherson, who was killed at Atlanta.

General Crocker's health was always feeble, but he was known as a most faithful, vigilant, brave, and far-seeing officer. Under his command the Iowa Brigade became famous as an organization of fighting men, which reputation they preserved to the end. He was transferred from this brigade by order of General Grant to a division, and in the various battles fought early in 1863 before the surrender of Vicksburg his management of his division and his great effort in the field, though worn by disease and pain, made him a marked man. He was made brigadier-general on the recommendation of General Grant November 29, 1862, before these battles were fought in 1863, and showed that his promotion was deserved.

He was continually on duty and rendering service in advance of his rank. In the advance on Atlanta in 1864 he was placed in command of the Fourth Division Seventeenth Army Corps and started with his division, after their veteran furlough, for the field, but he was unable to bear the insidious attacks of the disease which his exposure in the field had increased, and he relinquished the command to General Gresham. He was then placed on duty in New Mexico, returned to the East, and died in Washington, away from family, fireside, and friends, on August 26, 1865.

In order that the estimate placed on General Crocker by General Grant, that thorough observer of military men, may be understood, the following extract from a letter addressed by him to General Belknap, the president of the Society of Crocker's Iowa Brigade, is appended:

"I will have to excuse myself to the survivors—veterans—of a brigade so renowned for its marches, battles, losses upon the field, and high soldierly qualities of its first commander. No reflection upon subsequent commanders, but I regarded General Crocker among the ablest of the general officers with whom I was associated in the early years of the rebellion. Dying, as he was, at the beginning of the great struggle, he nevertheless was always ready for any duty, whether of fatigue or danger, or both combined; he succumbed to disease, * * * and in him Iowa lost one of the bravest men and most capable of soldiers."

This letter had reference to a declination by General Grant of an invitation to attend the brigade meeting, as he was engaged elsewhere.

General Crocker was a brave and everlastingly energetic man. Attacked by disease almost at the beginning of his service, he was ill all the time; he braved the danger of field and fight, won high honor, gained the personal approval of General Grant, and died in early life from the effects of peril and exposure.

His widow is very poor, and his two daughters, themselves in feeble health, earn a precarious living, which they share with their mother, by type-writing.

In view of his distinguished services and the destitute condition of his family, the pittance which his widow asks should be added to her pension.

Therefore we recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, any man can defeat this bill to-night by simply raising an objection to it. Any parrot can do the same thing. Therefore I do not rise to raise objection to it. I wish to call the attention of the House to the simple fact that the proper mode to legislate upon these cases is, in my humble judgment, to treat every soldier of the war exactly as though he possessed all the qualities this committee has stated to the country was possessed by General Crocker. He commenced at the commencement of the war; so did they they. He left home; so did thousands of others. He was brave, energetic, and patriotic; so were thousands of others. He died in the field far from home and among strangers; so did thousands of others, and those others or their dependents are as poor as those of General Crocker.

They were just as brave, just as self-sacrificing; they suffered just as much, endured as much, and fought from as lofty motives, and yet there are thousands of them to-day dying in squalid homes and crowded poor-houses, all for the lack of the paltry $8 or $10 a month pension which they do not get, and we stand here and refuse to extend to them that Government help which every business man of common understanding and just principles on this floor would extend to a man who worked for him and who might become disabled by the kick of a mule on his farm.

Sir, I want to raise my voice here now, as I do not want to be continually doing it, not to offer any captious objection, because of the few members present, to the passage of the bill; not to call for a quorum or to kill the bill in the absence of a quorum, but simply to call attention to this system of legislation, for the purpose of saying that in my judgment it is vicious and wrong all the way through. While it is true that General Crocker was in a position requiring more mental ability, a position more difficult to fill than that occupied by those who carried muskets and served in a humble capacity under him, it is also true that his condition and pay were commensurate with his responsibilities; and he had a thousand privileges not shared by the men who served under him in his command and who carried muskets during the war.

We now propose to say by this class system of legislation, "We will feed one of you upon codfish and one upon roast beef." But one was a brilliant officer, high in rank, the other a humble private. I admit that $30 a month is not a very great income for anybody, but it is as good to the widow of a brigadier-general as to the widow of the soldier who served under him; and I raise my voice here to-night not as a special pleader for the poor man, but on the simple principle that all men actuated by the same motives, doing all that they could in any capacity, no matter how humble, have equal claims upon my gratitude, and the justice if not the gratitude of the country. I will have, therefore, to vote against this amendment. Possibly I shall stand alone in that action; but I shall raise my voice against these distinctions that are made here in these bills; and in the future it is my purpose to vote against every single proposition of this character. Not that I object to the granting of pensions or to large pensions. Not that I object to the right of the House to do this. The House has the right to do, under the Constitution, as it pleases. It can pass the bill in any shape it pleases, but it is my desire to enter my vote and my protest against this feature embodied in bills of this character.

Do not tell me that I am fighting the memory of General Crocker. There is not a soldier who fought under him who does not cherish his memory, who does not honor him and love him; and yet there is not one of them who has a higher respect, regard, or veneration for his character or services than I have. He has a claim on American gratitude which I am the last man to deny and the first to accord.

But the fact remains that every man who trudged in the mud and sand and the rain during the war and who carried a musket for $14 a month is just as much entitled to credit and to gratitude as General Crocker, and deserves as much at the hands of the people and of this Government. Why, look at the subject for a moment. Men may gush upon this question of pensions; they may grow eloquent in support of it, but it does little credit to a man—pardon the expression—to gush and let his feelings get the better of his judgment, and express those lofty sentiments in one case because a man happened to hold high rank, while there are thousands of other soldiers just as meritorious who are receiving nothing from the Government. I say it is not good or fair legislation.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. Were General Crocker's services as valuable to the country as old Mother Bickerdyke's?

Mr. PRICE. The question has no relevancy whatever to the subject. But I would not give more attention to this woman than to the woman away out in some far-off corner in the northwest region, who chopped her own wood, repaired her own fences, gathered her own grain, harnessed her own horses, and kept her children warmly clad and fed, while her husband was in the front fighting the battles of his country. Each woman did all that she could, and they did their whole duty, and I would treat all alike. This is only justice to them all.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I desire to ask whether the theory of pensions, as adopted by all the governments of the world, has not been rather in the light of a support for the future than as compensation for the past?

Mr. PRICE. There comes in the difficulty again. I have got your question. A lawyer can not do anything unless he has precedent. He can find a precedent for the murder of the purest and divinest character that man has ever known. I do not care for precedent. I am governed by principles of abstract justice. That I would do though the heavens should fall.

We are standing right over a volcano, superinduced by this very system of class legislation, which will wreck our Government, disrupt it into a million of atoms, unless we do away with the causes which engender it. It is a volcano which will explode under our feet unless we adhere to the principle of doing exact and equal justice to all. We can never do too much for the widow of General Crocker or the widow of any other soldier who served his country, but we should do the same for all. To-day, but for their services, that flag would not be floating over the Speaker's chair. We would not be able to sit here to-night under the shadow of it but for the gallant services of the thousands and tens of thousands of men who served the country just as faithfully as General Crocker.

Now, sir, I do not want to say anything but what justice demands. We should take up all of these cases and relieve them so far as an exhaustless Treasury and the boundless gratitude of the nation enable us to do. But for these men, and their toils and sufferings, we should have no Treasury, and nothing to put in it if we had the Treasury. I shall vote against the amendment, and if it is adopted I shall probably vote for the bill; but yet at the same time I seek to remind this House that there is a storm arising all over the country that will compel you ere long to heed it. They say that I am severely criticised for voting alone against pensioning Mrs. Grant; and yet, Mr. Chairman, I have more than a desk full of letters from all your States commending that vote, because it is consistent with the eternal principle of justice.

If there was but one woman in this position I would give it to her. If there were a hundred, I would divide it among them. If there were a thousand, I would divide it among them. But I would not make any distinction based on rank and position.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I desire to say, in connection with this bill, that Iowa does not ask anything for the widow of General Crocker that has not been given to the widows of other generals. If it is said that the widows of other generals are not receiving enough I will say amen to the proposition and will help to remedy that as fast as it can be done. But do not let us throw a block in the way of this proposition now before the House. There is precedent after precedent where widows of brigadier-generals have received $50 per month. This is the first case where Iowa has presented a claim of this character; and it is for the widow, and the poor widow, of one of the most distinguished soldiers any State produced during the war.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Can the gentleman from Iowa give any reason why the widow of a brigadier-general should receive more than the widow of a private soldier?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I should like to give every widow of a private soldier just as much.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. It should be borne in mind that the fame of these generals would have amounted to nothing if it had not rested on the valor of the private soldiers under their command.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman from West Virginia will select the widow of some officer equally entitled with the widow of General Crocker to a pension like this, I will vote with him.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I will select the widow of some private soldier equally entitled.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If you do, I will vote with you every time.

Mr. PRICE. The logic of the argument in favor of this bill is, if all are deserving of this recognition give it to one. But I say the inevitable tendency of passing such bills as this is to defraud or lessen the chances of others equally worthy. You had a meeting of the Grand Army of the Republic in Maine last fall, and that body of men voted, by a small majority, against a general pension law. Why? Because those having political positions, occupying the higher stations in life, where they could command support, are already relieved to a large extent; and as these men of influence have their wants provided for, it must inevitably result in the others being uncared for.

I say every one of these special acts lessens the chances of a broad comprehensive bill founded on the principles of justice. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] says they ask this for Iowa, and that this is the first time that they have made such a request. The gentleman can ask nothing for Iowa that I would not give if it was a fair request. But General Crocker did not belong to Iowa. He was ours. He belongs to the people of the United States, and his widow deserves all that we can give her in justice to the widows of other men equally meritorious.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. While I am in favor of liberal pensions and in favor of pensioning every soldier that carried the musket and the knapsack for sixty days and has an honorable discharge, and while I am in favor of pensioning every widow of a soldier whether he lost his life in the service or not, believing that the Government owes that to the soldiers and their widows, yet I want to deny right here and now the proposition that the widow of an officer has any right to one cent more pension than the widow of the man who carried the musket and knapsack in the ranks.

Mr. PRICE. Sound!

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Such a distinction is not right upon principle. The officer who goes into the field and gets his $150 or $250 a month sleeps in his tent and lives like a prince when he can, while the poor soldier has to suffer innumerable hardships. The widow of the officer suffers no more pangs than the widow of the private soldier. She did not endure half the hardships during the war that the widow of the private soldier endured, because the officer received his larger pay and sent it home and was able to support her like a lady, while the wife of the private soldier was living in her hovel, and was working day in and day out to support her children all the time the wife of the officer was living in comfort provided by the means her husband got from the Government. To make this distinction is not right as a matter of principle. I do not propose to vote against this bill, but I say that this distinction is not just to the widows of the private soldiers of the land.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Did not the Government make a distinction in the compensation it gave to these men when they were serving their country?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Is not Congress following the same precedent, and doing what the Government did when compensating these men for their services? Is it not preserving the same distinction, recognizing, perhaps, that their services were more valuable than the services of the private soldier; and that when the wife of one of these officers became a widow in consequence of his death, or being stricken down in battle, she suffered a greater pecuniary loss, because of the value of his services, than did the widow of the private soldier? Is not that the principle and distinction that have been formulated and observed in Congress and observed in legislation?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I understand that is true; that that has been the principle that has been formulated and carried out in legislation here.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the gentleman, is it a wrong principle?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir; it has been formulated here because the brigadier-generals have sat in these seats and the private soldiers have not. If the private soldiers had sat here this distinction would not have been kept up. I was myself in the Army. I carried a musket and knapsack for eighteen months. It was my fortune to get a commission afterward. After I got that commission and commanded the men of my company I did not undergo half the hardships that I did while I carried a musket and knapsack by the side of my neighbor boy that I went out with, and I do not think that because I was fortunate enough to get that commission I should be entitled to one cent more pension than he, because we started upon an equal footing.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Did you not think at the time that you should receive more compensation than the man who carried the musket and did you not accept it?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No, sir; I did not believe that I was entitled to any more compensation, but the Government offered it to me, and, just like the rest of you, I took it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I will answer it if I can.

Mr. ROWELL. Do you think that in all positions of life and in all kinds of employment the compensation ought to be exactly the same?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No, sir, I do not think that; but I think that where one man took equal risk with another the compensation ought to be the same.

Mr. ROWELL. Do you think the pecuniary loss to a wife whose husband could earn her eight or ten thousand dollars a year is no greater when he dies than the loss in the case of a woman whose husband could earn her only $1,000 a year?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. You can not measure it in that way. There were a great many brigadier-generals who never earned their wives one-tenth of $1,000 a year; but this is a thing that you can not measure in that way. If you are going to undertake to regulate the pension by what the husband might have done or might have earned you will have a great deal of difficulty in dealing with the subject of pensions. If we undertake to do that we shall have to organize ourselves into a court to try each case by itself. I am talking now about the plain question of principle, and I say it is not right that a man because he happened to be fortunate enough to get a commission should be preferred in the matter of pension. I have seen men command regiments and command brigades when men who were their superiors were in the ranks carrying muskets and knapsacks. It is not a question of ability; it is a question of fortune; it is a question that circumstances have a great deal to do with. While there are thousands of women who deserve pensions, but who have none, it is not right to increase a pension that is already large enough to support the widow. The present pension will do that respectably, much better than $8 a month will support the widow of a private soldier.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I have said perhaps a scorce of times on the floor of this House what I say now, and I hope that this will be the last time, at least during the present Congress, that I shall be called upon to say it. The principle announced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] is right; it meets my concurrence and it has always done so. I think that the pensions of the widows of general officers ought not to have been increased to $50 a month; but it was begun many years ago. It began by pensioning the widows of general officers who had been killed in battle, and so it went on step by step until the same rate of pension was given to the widows of all general officers.

It is a very difficult thing for a committee now, when such a bill is brought before it, to refuse to allow the pension after such pensions have been allowed so frequently, for they have been allowed in nearly every case—in every case, I think, where they have been asked. In the same way it is difficult for the House to refuse these pensions. It was wrong in the beginning; I admit that. But it has been so established by precedent that it is almost impossible now to refuse in any particular case without saying to the person asking it, impliedly at least, "Your husband's services were not worthy of this mark of recognition. They were not as valuable as the services of other general officers whose widows have had their pensions increased to $50 per month." That is the great difficulty in the way.

Now, as to the other question, if the House will indulge me, I want to say this, for I think it will relieve the minds of gentlemen in relation to the distinction between officers and privates. The law under which the volunteer forces are pensioned was made for the regular Army. There a reason obtained for the different rates of pension because an officer of the regular Army enters into an engagement for his lifetime. He goes into the Army to remain during good behavior, and he and his widow, perhaps, for that reason alone, are entitled to special consideration over the enlisted men of the regular Army who serve only for a definite period of enlistment, three or five years. That was the reason for establishing the distinction with reference to the regular Army; but I have never been able to see any reason why there should be such a distinction between the officers and the enlisted men of the volunteer forces; for the reason that they come out of the same community, out of the same walks of life, and return to the same community and stand there together, citizens alike, having entered the service at the same time and left it at the same time. There seems to be no good reason why there should be any distinction between them.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The more reason, then, for removing the distinction.

Mr. MATSON. Yes. There has been some suggestion in the course of the debate here during the last two or three days in regard to a general equalization law. That matter has been pressed upon the attention of our committee. We undertook in the last Congress to devise some scheme in the nature of a commission or something of that kind for the purpose of revising the pension laws and making them more equitable, and I apprehend that the same thing will be undertaken again. We will do the best we can in that direction; but I trust the members of this House will bear in mind that it is a very difficult thing to take away a pension that has once been granted. It is a very difficult thing to do that; and, on the other hand, it is a very difficult thing to raise the pensions of all to the highest limit.

This is a broad question; and I have only thrown out these suggestions for the purpose of relieving the minds of members upon some of these points on which I thought I might be able to give some light.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, having been a soldier for four years, though on an unfortunate side, I have very little regard for these "tin soldiers." The truth is I have always observed that the reputations of the generals, the colonels, the majors, and the captains were made by the sweat and the sufferings of the private soldier. For this reason I have looked with abhorrence upon a disposition to draw a class distinction, and to give to the officer a pension which after the battle is over would support him in a very different grade of life from the poor fellow who carried the musket and the knapsack and who gained the victory and gave reputation to his officer.

Mr. PRICE. And came between the general and danger.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. My judgment in this matter has been formed from knowledge acquired on the battlefield—and I have no apologies to make for it; acquired on the battlefield—where I had opportunity to observe the difference between the common soldier and the officer, who in many cases stood hundreds of yards in the rear. Now, why in carrying out a great and beneficent system of pensions in this country should we draw a class distinction, and make an aristocracy of the descendants and the heirs of officers, while we place upon a lower plane the descendants and the heirs of private soldiers, who were alike volunteers in a great war? There is no other country on the face of the globe that has such a pension law as you are undertaking to establish here. England with her aristocracy, Russia with her autocracy, Germany with her emperor, and France—none of these countries have any such pension law as takes the officers and places them over and above the people whose lives have been sacrificed in defense of their country. We have seen here in this House a family with an annual income of over half a million dollars put upon the pension-list of this Government as the mendicants of the Government, to the disgrace of the Congress that passed the measure, rather than of those who received its benefits.

Following that up, I ask you what is the theory of pensions? The theory of pensions is to provide support for those who can not support themselves because of what they have suffered in defense of their country. Why, then, do you want to degrade your soldiers, who deserve all the credit you can give them—the men who without training took your flag, hoisted it above their heads, and nerved by their own patriotism and energy marched to the front of the battle? Why do you want to degrade them as mendicants of the Government, to strike down that patriotism and make these men mere paupers dependent upon your will?

I know that your common soldiers are honorable, courageous men, I know that they are patriots, because I have met them on the battlefield; I am here to stand by them; but I am here to protest in the name of the soldier who has suffered, and who suffers to-day on account of his service in behalf of the country, against degrading the patriotism and courage of the American citizen to the level of a mere dependent upon the bounty of the Government.

Mr. WOLFORD. Before the vote is taken I want to say a few words; and I wish the attention of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE], as well as everybody else. I propose to address myself to his head, not his heart. I disagree with the doctrine advocated so ably here by distinguished men that rank should make no difference in pensions. Away back in the history of man—God knows when it commenced—when the best men were selected to command, it was thought that the commander deserved more credit than any private. Those old-fashioned people had not learned what my distinguished friend has learned. They thought that he who has control of ten thousand lives, and by his skill, his wisdom, his strategy is able to care for and defend the lives of ten thousand men is entitled to more credit than a mere subordinate. This is the way that our forefathers reasoned—the way that wise men have reasoned all through the annals of history. This is the principle on which God Almighty acted, as declared in Holy Writ.

Now, I will put a case to my distinguished friend here. A man who, like General Grant, commanded a hundred thousand men with consummate skill—what did he have to do? Only to take care of General Grant? It has been said—I hope not invidiously—that the officers stood back and the soldiers went in front. I have seen officers go in front—have seen it often. Gentlemen who have not seen this have not associated in the Army with the kind of officers I have known.

When a military officer is placed in charge of a hundred thousand men, what mind, what genius, what collected courage he must have to lead such a command! What responsibility rests upon him! Why, sir, in ordinary commercial business, when you make a man responsible for a million dollars you pay him a higher salary than if he were responsible for only five dollars. Will any gentleman say that the man who takes charge of a million dollars and is responsible for that amount should receive no more compensation than the man who takes charge of five dollars?

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WOLFORD. Certainly; that is what I desire.

Mr. PRICE. Did we not pay the officers more?

Mr. WOLFORD. We did pay them more. I am undertaking to state the reason why they deserved more pay and why they deserve more pension. Will you tell me, sir, that he who is responsible for a hundred thousand lives should receive no more than a mere private soldier? Look at the question a moment. Sir, it is a great thing to stand upon the battlefield and with your spy-glass in hand, amidst the roar of musketry and artillery, be cool enough to take in the situation and so command as to make most effective the thousands of men who are to be controlled and made available.

Mr. PRICE. Is it more dangerous to stand with a spy-glass in hand than with a musket?

Mr. WOLFORD. I am not talking about danger, but about duty.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SOWDEN. What is the difference between the wife of a great general who led a hundred thousand troops and the wife of a poor private?

Mr. WOLFORD. Well, sir, I will come to the wives of our soldiers directly. [Laughter.] I put it to the candor of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE], when he talks as he does, whether the man who saved one hundred thousand lives—and what is higher, what is nobler, what is grander than one hundred thousand lives—who saved the honor of one hundred thousand men, is not entitled to more consideration and greater credit than the man who only saved one life?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WOLFORD. Certainly, I will yield for a question, although I wish to get through as quickly as possible. I have a few more things to say, and will say them now while I have the opportunity.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. As I understand it, the gentleman yields to me, and I wish, as he had experience as a commanding officer in the war, to ask him if he ever knew of a single case of a captain who made his company; whether, on the contrary, it was not always the company that made the captain?

Mr. WOLFORD. It is like King George's apple dumpling, when he could not tell whether the dough was in the apples or the apples were in the dough. [Laughter.] I say they are all the same. I put it to the candor of every man here, if you saved one hundred thousand lives—I put it to you, sir, if you had it in your power to save one hundred thousand lives, or the honor of one hundred thousand people, if you had it in your power to save the best interests of your country by your skill and courage, have you done no more than the man who has merely packed his musket and obeyed your orders? You can not say so, because you would contradict the experience of men. The gentleman from Wisconsin can not say so, because he would contradict and stultify his own great reasoning powers.

I am now trying to address your reason. I am making no appeal to sympathy—I scorn your sympathy in such a case as this. I put it upon the ground of service. He that does much shall receive much. So said God Almighty, and do you wish to reverse that decree?

There is a thing called righteousness; all the world desires to be called righteous whether they are so or not. Now, what is righteousness? It is a great number of righteous acts—doing right things and keeping on doing them—having it in your power to do great good. Well, the wisdom of the world long before I was born, and I can not go back on that, the wisdom of the world, sir, before you were born, said he who has done most for his country shall receive most at his country's hands. So it is now, and so it always has been. It is the unchangeable law.

I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin—you need not accuse me now of trying to appeal to your heart; I am trying to talk to your brain [laughter]—I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin candidly, can he as an honest man answer this argument which I have made? Will he get up here and say that a man who has saved one hundred thousand lives, who has saved all the dearest, the sweetest, the most sacred interests of a hundred thousand people, is entitled to no more credit and no more honor and no more reward than the man who merely saved his own life? No, sir; he can not do it.

A member arose.

Mr. WOLFORD. I am not through yet; I wish to go on and talk a little further on this matter. Why did the whole nation say, Mr. Chairman, that General Grant was the greatest man in this whole nation! Not because he was intrinsically the greatest man in the whole country, not because as an individual he was greater than you or any other man, but because the opportunity was presented to him and he embraced it. It was because he saved the lives of many thousands of men—because he led them in the midst of a great civil war, through strife and carnage, to crowning victory. It is because he won success for his country and made her triumphant in the day of peril. That is the reason why the whole country said he was the greatest man. That is the reason why the world said he was the greatest general of his time. He who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, the great Washington, he deserved more credit than anybody else in the Revolution, because he had the opportunity and he embraced it. He led our armies to victory. That is the fact in history, and you can not change it, try as you will. It is a stubborn fact and you can not get round it.

We have heard some talk here that the officers made the privates, or the privates made the officers. They both belonged to the country and each was necessary to the other, and the glory which was won belonged equally to both, but those who did the most were entitled to the most.

I have been asked by my distinguished friend as to the wives of our soldiers. They were in partnership, the soldiers and their wives. The soldiers went into the Army and fought the battles of the country while their wives remained at home. I believe their interests were in common, and that they are equally entitled to credit. And they should be treated as entitled to equal consideration. Those who were regarded as worthy to be wives of our gallant soldiers should not be degraded—you, sir, should not go back on these widows, on these wives, for I understand you have taken a wife yourself. [Laughter.] Do them justice; that is all I ask at your hands.

I hope you will not go back on your history. I hope that you will not say that these gallant soldiers' widows shall not receive as much of a pension as the other widows of general officers have been allowed to receive heretofore.

And now, Mr. Chairman, another word upon another subject before I take my seat. I shall not make any appeals to the House, but, sir, I want to say a single word and give the reasons why I discuss it now, as I have a right to do in the Committee of the Whole. I want to say a word in behalf of a lady whose pension claim was considered to-night, who did more for her country than any brigadier-general who has been referred to in this discussion. Her pension was not objected to on the ground that she was not meritorious, but because, as I understand it, men were afraid that they would set an example and a precedent in other cases. But, sir, I hope when the vote is taken in the House, after this committee has risen, that you will consider that this lady has given more to her country than any brigadier-general, more on account of mercy to the suffering soldiers, more to save the lives of our wounded soldiers than any of them, and that you will consider when you come to vote on the question in the House the propriety of increasing her pension to $50 a month instead of that recommended by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word before the vote is taken upon the passage of this bill.

The name of General Crocker is one that creates enthusiasm and is venerated on every hearth-stone in Iowa. I had hopes, sir, that this bill would pass without provoking any discussion. I can readily conceive the objection gentlemen urge when they oppose this bill, and the honest convictions which influence them, because they can see no reason why a larger pension should be given to the widow of a brigadier-general than to a private soldier. I think the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON], in the course of his remarks, answered his own objections himself when he stated that it was for support and not service that extra pensions were granted.

In a suit for damages for the death of an individual this widow or family would ask and receive a greater amount in a court of law if his earnings are shown to be large than would be received if his compensation had been small. That would be the measure of damages, and so it is in cases of this character. These matters are considered in all cases, both in law and equity. The compensation the individual receives and the service he rendered must be taken into account, and it is the service of the man—what he did—which is the basis upon which relief is granted to his family after his death. I take it that that is the reason why all pensions have been graded in all nations of the earth that grant pensions. They are based upon the position held by the party entitled to the pension in the service.

I can readily understand the motives which influence my warm-hearted friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] in opposing this bill. I do not think, sir, that his opposition rests so much upon the fact that this is a pension for $50 a month to the widow of a brigadier-general as because the pension of the private soldier is not $50 a month. I agree with him most heartily. Certainly there is no difference in merit between the applicants; and on this question there is no difference between the gentleman and myself.

I know my friend's warm and hearty feelings for the soldiers. I can recollect of no other gentleman now who in the last session of Congress introduced a bill to pension every worthy soldier in our service, and I may be permitted to say that I know of no one else who made a favorable report other than myself, who made a minority report from the committee upon that bill. I cheerfully yield, therefore, to the honest motives of my friend in opposing this bill. His heart is big enough to take in every soldier in the country, no matter under what circumstances or what or where or how the services were rendered.

But, Mr. Chairman, the case of General Crocker is an exception; the case of his widow is different from that of many of the distinguished gentlemen who have received pensions from Congress heretofore or who may receive pensions in this Congress. General Crocker was a man who paid attention to the needs and wants of others more than to his own. Indeed, in his care for others he neglected his own affairs and died poor. He carried the flag of the country through the fierce flame of battle and planted it on the uppermost heights, and the grand men who stood by him will rejoice to-night and in future days when this Congress shall do his widow and his family this scanty meed of justice. We can afford to make an exception of General Crocker's case—a man who was distinguished in those days of fire, iron, and blood as among the best and the bravest; and I hope there will be no dissenting voice to the passage of this bill.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman where he would be willing to draw the line?

Mr. HOLMES. With the permission of the Chair I will answer the gentleman from West Virginia by saying that when every soldier, great and small, in this country has received his just deserts, and when their widows and families have been cared for, and none are left destitute, then I will draw the line, and not before.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Then you mean to say that you will draw the line when the families of every officer have been favored over and above the families of the common soldiers of the country?

Mr. HOLMES. I think I have made myself clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 41, noes 3.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. In deference to the request of the other gentlemen I shall defer calling a quorum on this issue. I do that, I repeat, in deference to other advice, while I feel in my conscience that I am submitting to a wrong upon my constituents and upon the people of this country.

So (no further count being demanded) the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar under the special order of the House, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof:

A bill (H. R. 3827) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Rosser, of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. 3846) to remove the disabilities of Alexander P. Stewart, of La Fayette County, Mississippi; and

A bill (H. R. 4409) to remove the disabilities of Edward G. W. Butler, of Missouri.

Bills of the following titles, reported without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed;

A bill (H. R. 551) granting a pension to Rhoda Dane;

A bill (H. R. 1475) granting a pension to Margaret Flaherty;

A bill (H. R. 646) granting a pension to Thomas M. Commuck;

A bill (H. R. 16) granting a pension to Mrs. Nancy L. Ribble;

A bill (H. R. 758) granting a pension to Alexander Harper;

A bill (H. R. 802) granting a pension to August Schindler;

A bill (H. R. 4410) for the relief of John C. Clark;

A bill (H. R. 702) granting a pension to Dr. J. F. Bruner;

A bill (H. R. 602) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna D. W. Eichman;

A bill (H. R. 634) granting a pension to John Defenbaugh; and

A bill (H. R. 650) granting an increase of pension to Charlotte D. Crocker.

Bills of the following titles were reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments, the amendments were agreed to, and the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 698) granting a pension to Philip D. Campbell;

A bill (H. R. 1468) increasing the pension of John P. Davis;

A bill (H. R. 414) granting a pension to Daniel B. Clark; and

A bill (H. R. 693) granting a pension to William B. Keith.

The title was changed so as to read "to restore to the pension-roll the name of William B. Keith."

The bill (H. R. 700) granting a pension to Mrs. M. A. Bickerdyke was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out $50 per month and insert $25 per month.

Mr. WOLFORD. I desire to have a vote on that amendment.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The report of the committee, I understand, is $25 per month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee recommend an amendment striking out $50 and inserting $25. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 27, noes 12.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. MATSON. I move to reconsider the several votes by which bills have been passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAYNE: Resolutions of Union Lodge, No. 86, of A. O. U. W., of Pennsylvania; of Ottawa Tribe, No. 64, I. O. of R. M., of Pittsburgh, Pa., and of Camp No. 4, Sons of Veterans, of Pittsburgh, Pa., in favor of giving title to a portion of the public domain to the surviving officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war for the Union, or to their widows and children, and to pay the difference between the value of paper money and gold at the several times of payment—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WAIT: Petition of Charles Young, for relief—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. T. B. WARD: Petition of citizens of Hamilton County, Indiana, asking that soldiers and sailors of the United States Army and Navy be pensioned—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. A. J. WARNER: Petition and papers relating to the claim of Battelle and Evans—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, papers in the case of Francis Hammond—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER: Petition of re-enlisted veterans of the Union Army and Mexican war—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WISE: Resolution of District Assembly No. 84, Knights of Labor, Richmond, Va., in reference to international copyright—to the Committee on Patents.

The following petitions, praying Congress to place the coinage of silver upon an equality with gold; that there be issued coin certificates of one, two, and five dollars, the same being made legal tender; that one and two dollar legal-tender notes be issued, and that the public debt be paid as rapidly as possible by applying for this purpose the idle surplus now in the Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

By Mr. BLAND: Of citizens of Utah.

By Mr. TOWNSHEND: Of citizens of Jefferson and Franklin Counties, Illinois.

SENATE.

MONDAY, January 25, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. GEORGE presented the credentials of EDWARD C. WALTHALL, chosen by the Legislature of Mississippi a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Lucius Q. C. Lamar in the term ending March 3, 1889.

The credentials were read.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that the oath of office be administered to the Senator-elect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator-elect from Mississippi will please come forward and take the oath of office.

Mr. WALTHALL advanced to the desk of the President pro tempore, escorted by Mr. GEORGE, and, the oath of office having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 19th instant, certain information in relation to the amount of United States bonds called for payment February 1, 1886, held by national banks; which, on motion of Mr. INGALLS, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July 5, 1884, a report of the Quartermaster-General as to purchases of supplies made by his department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication is accompanied with a large mass of papers, which are in the Secretary's office. What shall be done with the communication?

Mr. INGALLS. I move the reference of the communication, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Military Affairs, that they may decide whether they shall be printed or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that reference will be made.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] if the requirement of the act of July 5, 1884, was not at the instance of the Committee on Appropriations? I was thinking that probably the communication had better go to the Committee on Appropriations, and they can determine whether the accompanying papers ought to be printed or not.

Mr. INGALLS. Either reference will be satisfactory to me, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri move that reference?

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the papers be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think this information was called for by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is sent in accordance with a provision in an appropriation act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an annual report, made in pursuance of law.

Mr. ALLISON. It should go to the Committee on Appropriations, then. I remember the provision was made in the last Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with section 229 of the Revised Statutes, a statement of the contracts made by the War Department and its bureaus for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the board on fortifications or other defenses, organized under a provision of the act of March 3, 1885; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, on motion of Mr. CAMERON, referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with section 191 of the Revised Statutes, an annual report of clerks employed in the War Department; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an increase of the force in the office of the Commissioner of Railroads; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of George Harlan Post, No. 139, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, praying the allowance to each soldier of the late war of a portion of the public domain; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of J. Monroe Kreiter, jr., president, and other officers and members of Typographical Union No. 14, of Harrisburg, Pa., protesting against the passage of the so-called "international copyright bill" on the ground that it will work great injustice to their trade; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of Caroline Sees, of Harrisburg, Pa., widow of Maj. Oliver W. Sees, late chief of transportation and telegraphing department on the staff of Maj. Gen. D. N. Couch, commanding Department of the Susquehanna, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Col. John B. Clark Post, No. 162, Grand Army of the Republic, of Alleghany City, Pa.; the petition of Maj. A. M. Harper Post, No. 181, Grand Army of the Republic; the petition of Lieut. James M. Lysle Camp, No. 2, Sons of Veterans, West Pennsylvania Division United States Army, of Allegheny City, Pa.; the petition of the Ottawa Tribe, No. 64, Independent Order of Red Men, of Pittsburgh, Pa.; the petition of the Union Lodge, No. 86, Ancient Order of United Workingmen of Pennsylvania, and the petition of Col. Henry B. Hays Camp, No. 4, Sons of Veterans, United States Army, of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying Congress to provide by proper legislation for giving to the surviving officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war for the Union, or to their widows and children, a title to a portion of the public domain, as was done to the soldiers of other wars, and also to the said officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines the difference of value between the paper money paid them as pay and bounty and gold money at the several times of payment; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the petition of a large number of citizens of Kansas, setting forth at length the necessity for the opening of the Indian Territory to settlement, the allotment of lands to the Indians in severalty, and the appropriation of the remainder for the uses of actual settlers. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I also present the petition of a large number of citizens of Kansas, praying that the coinage of silver be placed on an equality with the coinage of gold, with certain other modifications of the present law in regard to the use of silver certificates. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying that a pension be granted to William Dobbs, late a private in Company K, One hundred and nineteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Sedgwick County, Kansas, praying that Oscar Reed, late a private in Company A, Second West Virginia Infantry, be placed on the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, praying for the enactment of a bankruptcy law. As a bill in reference to that subject has already been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL presented the petition of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Maritime Exchange, praying for the passage of the bill introduced by him providing for the construction, operation, and maintenance of a telegraph line in conjunction with a signal station at Point Jupiter, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Florida, praying that the naval reserve lands in La Fayette County, Florida, be turned over to the Interior Department, in order that they may be subject to homestead entry; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of pilots of Pensacola, Fla., remonstrating against the passage of the bill relating to pilots and pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Saint Paul, Minn., in reference to the Upper Missouri River, and the Yellowstone River, its principal tributary. I ask that the memorial be read. It is brief, and presents the public interests in that section so clearly that I think it proper to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the memorial will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist, the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Saint Paul, Minn., respectfully represents:

That the business men of Saint Paul are very largely interested in the trade of the Upper Missouri River, and anxiously look to the General Government for the speedy improvement of that important water way.

That there exists above the city of Bismarck 1,200 miles of navigable waters on this great stream, besides 400 miles of navigation on the main tributary thereof, the Yellowstone.

That in the valleys drained by these 1,600 miles of river there are no means of communication save by river.

That during the last season of navigation nearly 40,000,000 pounds of freight, and a very large list of passengers, were carried by steamers on these rivers above Bismarck.

That nearly all this freight went from Saint Paul.

That in the allotments of money heretofore made by Congress for the improvement of the Missouri River the bulk of the money has been used on the lower half of the river, where there is a great amount of water and navigation, with little commerce.

That the meager amounts heretofore allowed have made the navigation of the Upper Missouri possible for boats of 1,200 tons burden, and on the Yellowstone for vessels of 200 tons burden.

That the demands of this vast region are such that the improvement of these rivers should now be entered upon on a liberal and comprehensive scale and carried forward to an early completion, that the highest possible results may be accomplished by furnishing cheap transportation to this undeveloped and most interesting country.

That this chamber does most cordially and earnestly indorse the recommendations of the water-ways convention held at Saint Paul September 3 and 4, 1885, and which have recently received the strong approval of the great convention held in Kansas City the latter days of December last, which provide among other things that the Missouri River be divided into five sections, and that the allotments of money to these sections be made equal in amount.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are earnestly, requested to give this matter great attention and use every proper effort in aid thereof.

JOHN B. SANBORN, President.
Attest: WM. F. PHELPS, Secretary.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON presented the petition of William P. Vansant and 81 others, citizens of Morgan County, Indiana, praying Congress to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Arnotes Forrester, late a private in Company C, Twenty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present resolutions, in the nature of a memorial, adopted by the United Presbyterian Ministerial Association of Philadelphia, Pa., in favor of the passage of the Senate bill to prohibit the mailing of newspapers and other publications containing lottery advertisements, &c. Inasmuch as that subject has been reported upon by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads I move that the resolutions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, presented a petition of citizens of Maryland, praying for the repeal of the law requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to coin not less than $2,000,000 per month of standard silver dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of hospital stewards in the United States Army, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented a memorial of citizens of the State of Oregon, remonstrating against the suspension of silver coinage, and favoring legislation placing the coinage of silver on an equality with the coinage of gold; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the investigation of a land grant in Oregon, known as the Willamette and Cascade Mountain wagon-road grant; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of the Bar Association of the Territory of Montana, praying for the passage of an act providing for five justices of the supreme court of Montana; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GIBSON. I present a petition of the governor and State officers of the State of Louisiana and of citizens of Baton Rouge, La., in favor of the transfer of the barracks at Baton Rouge to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLUMB. The Committee on Public Lands have had under consideration two bills, the bill (S. 1108) to confirm title to certain private land grants in Arizona Territory, and the bill (S. 1109) to confirm the title to that certain private land grant "Tres Alamos," in Arizona Territory, and, conceiving them to belong properly to the jurisdiction of another committee, have instructed me to report them back to the Senate and ask that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and to provide for a settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain of said railroads, and to secure to the United States the payment of all indebtedness of certain of the companies therein mentioned, to report the same adversely, and also to report on the same subject a new bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill reported adversely will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PLATT. Ought it not to go upon the Calendar?

Mr. HOAR. The committee report the same bill in substance, only it is a new draught; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill reported by the committee will be read by its title.

The bill (S. 1200) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and to provide for a settlement of the claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain of said railroads, and to secure to the United States the payment of all indebtedness of certain of the companies therein mentioned, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and I presume that I do not transcend the proprieties in saying that it did not receive the unanimous support of that committee. It was reported by a majority, and I do not concur with their conclusions. While I do not wish to submit any formal report in behalf of the minority, I merely announce that, not concurring with the committee, I shall take occasion when the bill is called up to express my views upon the subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I concur in the statement made by the Senator from Kansas relative to the position of the committee in regard to the bill, and, in addition to what he has said, I desire now to propose an amendment to the bill, which I ask may be printed. I will venture the statement that the amendment will doubtless receive the approval of a majority of the committee. I am not prepared to say at this time that even with the adoption of the amendment I shall be prepared to give my support to the bill, but certainly I shall not be prepared to do so without the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I presume the amendment will receive the support of a majority of the committee. It was put in form by the Senator from Iowa too late to form a part of the report. If it be proper, I should like to have the amendment printed for the information of the Senate and referred to the committee without taking the bill from its place on the Calendar. I suppose that can be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] asks the unanimous consent of the Senate at this stage in the bill to offer an amendment, it being considered as pending for that purpose. If there be no objection, that will be agreed to. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks that the amendment without the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAIR. I should be glad to hear the amendment read.

Mr. HOAR. That is not necessary.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment is very short, I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the proposed amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That whenever, in the opinion of the President, it shall be deemed necessary to the protection of the interests and the preservation of the security of the United States in respect of its lien, mortgage, or other interest in any or the property of the several companies named in the first section of this act upon which a lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance, paramount to the right, title, or interest of the United States for the same property may exist, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under the direction of the President, redeem or otherwise clear off such paramount lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance, by paying the sums lawfully due in respect thereof out of the Treasury; and the United States shall thereupon become and be subrogated to all rights and securities theretofore pertaining to the debt, mortgage, lien, or other incumbrance in respect of which such payment shall have been made. It shall be the duty of the Attorney-General, under the direction of the President, to take all such steps and proceedings in the courts and otherwise as shall be needful to protect and defend the rights and interests of the United States in respect of the matters in this section mentioned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the amendment be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. PLATT. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes, direct me to report it with amendments. I have nearly completed a written report to submit, which, with the consent of the Senate, I shall file with the Secretary during the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 466) to regulate the subletting of contracts for carrying the United States mails, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

NORTHERN CHEYENNES IN MONTANA.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the joint resolution (H. Res. 91) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana, and there being a pressing exigency which this is designed to meet, I ask unanimous consent that it may be put upon its passage now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to use, out of the unexpended balance of the $50,000 appropriated in the act making appropriations for the Indian service for the fiscal year 1886, approved March 3, 1885, to supply food and other necessities of life in cases of distress among the Indians not having treaty funds, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to relieve the distress now existing among the Northern Cheyennes on the Rosebud and Tounge Rivers, in Montana, and furnish them with such food and other necessary articles as may be required; and in expending this amount he is authorized, if necessary, to purchase supplies in open market to an extent not to exceed $5,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The verbal amendment reported from the committee will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 12, correct the spelling of the word "Tongue" by changing "Tounge" to "Tongue."

Mr. DAWES. I apprehend it is not necessary for the joint resolution to go back to the House for that. It is a misprint, a misspelling of the word. I presume the engrossed bill is right, if the Secretary has the engrossed bill. I would not want the joint resolution to go back to the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk calls the attention of the Chair to another misspelling. It may be right in the engrossed bill and wrong in the print. If there be no objection the verbal amendments in the spelling of the words will be made.

Mr. DAWES. Will that involve its going back to the House?

Mr. INGALLS. Then let it not be done by a motion. If the bill is amended by motion in this body there is no way by which it can escape being sent to the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has sent for the engrossed bill.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest that the joint resolution be informally laid aside so as to get the engrossed bill. I think there is a misprint, and the trouble is not in the engrossed bill.

POTOMAC RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I report back from the Committee on the District of Columbia the bill (S. 200) to authorize the purchase of the Aqueduct Bridge or the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, D. C. The bill is reported with one amendment. I understand perfectly well that I have no right to communicate to the Senate what transpires in committee, but the chairman of the committee will himself, I think, certify the fact that this is the bill as it passed before without an objection in the Senate, changing the time from ninety days to six months. I ask to suspend any rule which prohibits the passage of the bill this morning and let it go through by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. I rise to morning business.

Mr. PLATT. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama rises to morning business, which is an objection for the moment.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to introduce a bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Let me understand. Does the Senator from Alabama object?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I merely rise to morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He objects for the moment.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not care to interrupt the Senator with his effort to get the bill before the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Of course I shall wait. What time does the morning business hour expire? We have had some doubt as to whether it was 1 or 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business will be concluded before 2 o'clock at any rate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I know the Senator from Alabama will not object after 2 o'clock.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The introduction of bills is not yet in order. Reports from standing or select committees are still in order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3827) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Rosser;

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 671) making an appropriation for the purchase of the old Produce Exchange building and the site bounded by Whitehall, Pearl, Moore, and Water streets, New York city, for army purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE RANKIN.

The message further conveyed to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. JOSEPH RANKIN, late a Representative of the State of Wisconsin.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the appointment of a special joint committee of seven members of the House of Representatives and three members of the Senate to take order for superintending the funeral and to escort the remains of the deceased to Manitowoc, Wis., and that Mr. BRAGG of Wisconsin, Mr. VAN SCHAICK of Wisconsin, Mr. GUENTHER of Wisconsin, Mr. CARLETON of Michigan, Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois, and Mr. JOHNSON, of New York had been appointed the committee on the part of the House.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 1201) granting a pension to Louise Ambrecht; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1202) to authorize the appointment of Indians to certain offices; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1203) to amend section 2805 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow oaths to be administered by notaries public; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1204) for the relief of the children of the late Surgeon Alfred M. Owen and to increase their pensions; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 1205) to provide for the issuing and recording of certain commissions in the Department of Justice; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1206) granting a pension to Ellen Bishop; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1207) granting a pension to Caroline Sees; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1208) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of the county of Schuylkill, in the State of Pennsylvania, for money advanced by it under allotments made by soldiers from said county during the late rebellion by virtue of section 12 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting property," approved July 22, 1861; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1209) to amend the law in relation to the registration of trade-marks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1210) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make sale of certain lands of the Umatilla Indian reservation to William S. Byers and others and to issue patent therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 1211) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the confederated tribes and bands of Indians occupying the Yakama reservation, in the Territory of Washington, for the extinguishment of their title to so much of said reservation as is required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, introduced a bill (S. 1212) for the further protection of property from fire and safety of lives in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1213) to regulate insurance in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill I introduce by request, without any knowledge on my part of the provisions which it contains. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS also introduced a bill (S. 1214) granting a pension to Seamus G. Morris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 1215) making an appropriation for the purchase of a right of way to Cape Orford light-station, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1216) making an appropriation for the purchase of a site and the construction of a light-house at Cape Meares, Tillamook Bay, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1217) for the relief of Henry Bellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 1218) to regulate the removal of causes by Federal corporations; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 1219) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenofsky; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1220) for the relief of Edward G. W. Butler from political disabilities; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 1221) relating to suits by the United States to set aside land patents; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 1222) for the relief of soldiers and sailors having lost a leg above the knee or an arm above the elbow-joint; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1223) for the relief of Wilbur F. Steele; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 1224) granting a pension to Henry H. Stutsman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1225) granting a pension to W. Park Alexander; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1226) to utilize certain public lands toward securing for the American people "work for workers and wages for work," or fair opportunities and just rewards; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I introduced this bill also in the last Congress, and then as now at the request of Mr. Charles Fred. Adams, who is the clerk of the Civil Service Commission. The bill relates to the investment of the savings of working people in the public lands. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1227) granting increase of pension to William P. Squires; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1228) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives, and granting pensions to invalid and dependent soldiers and sailors of the late war, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1229) to adjust the inequalities in the pensions paid certain soldiers and sailors who are utterly helpless from injuries received or disease contracted while in the United States service, and to increase the pensions of such soldiers and sailors as are or may thus become utterly helpless; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1230) authorizing the Interstate Rapid Transit Railway Company to build a bridge across the Kansas River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1231) for the relief of Frances McNeil Potter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHACE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 34) granting medals to the officers and men of the Thetis, Bear, and Alert, composing the arctic relief squadron sent to the relief of Lieutenant Greely and party in 1884; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AIDS TO GENERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. BUTLER. On the 12th of this month I introduced a bill (S. 1043) to amend sections 1097 and 1098 of the Revised Statutes relating to aids to general officers of the Army, which was ordered to lie on the table. I move that the bill, with the accompanying papers which I now present, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. GIBSON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Lucien Goyeaux be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of the State National Bank of Louisiana be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. PIKE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of the widow and children of John W. Judson be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

On motion of Mr. STANFORD, it was Ordered, That Jesse D. Carr have leave to withdraw the papers filed by him and now upon the files of the Senate.

Ordered, That all the papers relating to the cases hereinafter named be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, under the rules, and referred to the committees respectively hereinafter named, to-wit:

1. In the case of William R. Wheaton and Charles H. Chamberlain, to the Committee on Public Lands, to be by it considered in connection with Senate bill No. 988, first session Forty-ninth Congress.

2. In the cases of James M. Barney, William B. Hooper & Co., E. N. Fish & Co., Tully, Ochva & Co., William B. Hugas, to the Committee on Indian Affairs, to be by it considered in connection with Senate bill No. 989, first session Forty-ninth Congress.

3. In the case of State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections containing minerals, to the Committee on Public Lands, to be by it considered in connection with Senate bill No. 990, first session Forty-ninth Congress.

4. In the case of the relief of Jerome Madden, to the Committee on Public Lands, to be by it considered in connection with Senate bill No. 992, first session Forty-ninth Congress.

5. In the case of the unexpended balances heretofore appropriated by Congress for suppression of Indian hostilities in the State of California, to the Committee on Appropriations, to be by it considered in connection with Senate bill No. 993, first session Forty-ninth Congress.

6. In the case of granting the State of California 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands in said State, to the Committee on Public Lands, to be by it considered in connection with Senate bill No. 994, first session Forty-ninth Congress.

7. In the case of crediting the several States and Territories moneys collected under the direct tax levied by act of August 5, 1861, to the Committee on the Judiciary, to be by it considered in connection with Senate bill No. 995, first session Forty-ninth Congress.

ORDER DISBANDING CERTAIN REGIMENTS.

Mr. CONGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a certified copy of special order No. 89, Headquarters Department of Texas, dated April 28, 1866.

PORT ORFORD BREAKWATER.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate what disposition, if any, has been made of the $150,000 appropriated by Congress for the commencement of the construction of a breakwater at Port Orford, Oreg., by the act approved March 3, 1879.

ADJOURNMENTS OVER.

Mr. HOAR. I offer the following resolution as an amendment to the rules, to be referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That upon a motion that when the Senate adjourn to a day other than the next legislative day, the question shall always be taken in open session and by yeas and nays.

I move that that be referred to the Committee on Rules, and on the motion I should like to say one word. Both Houses adjourned at the end of the last Congress with a very large number of measures not acted upon, demanded by the country, very important to the public interest, and which were favored I am quite sure by a large majority of both Houses. Those measures were not dealt with simply for want of time. Congress expired leaving the grievances so far unredressed. We have now already reached nearly the close of the second month of this session. One-third of the time usually allotted to the long session of Congress has passed; one-fifth of the life of this entire Congress has passed; and a practice has grown up of moving on Thursday that the Senate adjourn to the following Monday, the motion being made at a time when large numbers of the Senators are not in their seats, interrupting sometimes a speech to make that motion; and those who desire to devote the public time to the public business find to their surprise that the motion has been adopted. It seems to some of us that a loss of two of the six days in the week devoted to legislation by the Senate ought not to be brought about without at least the entire Senate having an opportunity upon a call of yeas and nays to express its opinion. The call of yeas and nays secures the knowledge by the whole body that the question is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules if there be no objection.

NORTHERN CHEYENNES IN MONTANA.

Mr. DAWES. Now I ask that we resume action on the joint resolution I reported this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 91) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana.

Mr. DAWES. I have examined the engrossed bill and I find that the mistakes to which attention was called in the print exist also in the engrossed bill. I am inclined to think that while the engrossed bill makes it possible to ascertain the meaning of Congress, it would look very bad in print in the printed book of the laws of Congress, and therefore I propose to correct what was evidently the mistake of those who engrossed the bill in the other House. In line 8 I move to strike out the word "live," and to insert the word "life."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I also move to strike out in line 12 the word which has been printed and is the same in the engrossed bill before "rivers" and to insert in place of it the word "Tongue."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be considered as agreed to, there being no objection, it being verbal in its character.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time. The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts why this appropriation is made by joint resolution instead of bill?

Mr. DAWES. If I had drawn this measure it would have been a bill rather than a joint resolution. I agree with the Senator that that is the proper mode.

Mr. INGALLS. Then, inasmuch as we have amended this joint resolution and it must go back to the House for concurrence, I move that the title and frame of the joint resolution be so amended as to make it a bill in proper form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Kansas that this be changed in form from a joint resolution to a bill. Is there objection? If not, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. In the title of the bill I observe that they have failed to write out the name of these Indians in the proper form, and I move that the word "Cheyenns," as it appears in the print, be amended by inserting the letter "e" after the last "n" and before "s;" so as to read: "Northern Cheyennes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will please call the attention of the Secretary to that.

Mr. INGALLS. This seems to me an appropriate occasion to call attention to the extraordinary condition of the engrossing force which sends the bills to this body for concurrence. I think at the last session of Congress there were at least a dozen or fifteen bills that came here in such shape, it being impossible to consider them word by word, that after they had been enrolled it became necessary to correct them by joint resolution in consequence of the inefficiency of the enrolling force that was employed upon the bills before they were sent to this body. I do not know that there is any method by which this difficulty can be corrected, but it is a crying evil. It is a disgrace that a bill should be sent to this body in the condition of that which we have been considering this morning, the commonest words misspelled, the plain intent and purpose of Congress frustrated by the ignorance or carelessness of those persons who are employed to write out these bills on paper.

If any motion could be made I should be glad to submit it, but I know of nothing except the correcting influence of public opinion on this subject, and I take occasion therefore to call attention to the condition of this bill and of other measures that have been frequently sent here in such a condition that they were unintelligible and insensible. I trust that some measures will be taken to correct an evil that is disgraceful to the Congress of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having passed, the title will be changed to conform to the body of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Am I to understand the Senator from Kansas as referring to the enrolling and engrossing clerks of the Senate?

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, no.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Because I was going to say that having been chairman of the Committee on Engrossed Bills for some years I have never seen a more efficient set of clerks than those on the part of the Senate who engross our bills. I have had occasion to examine a number of bills, and very seldom have I found occasion to change a letter.

Mr. INGALLS. I will say in response to the Senator from Delaware that I did not refer to the enrolling and engrossing force employed by the Senate. I referred distinctly to the force that is employed in writing out the bills and resolutions which are sent to this body, and I called attention to the conspicuous neglect and carelessness that was apparent in the bill we have been considering this morning as an illustration.

POTOMAC RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I now renew my request for the consideration of the bill reported by me this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks that unanimous consent be given for the consideration of the bill reported by him from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have understood that two-thirds of this body could at any time suspend a rule. If I have been mistaken in that, I shall be obliged if the Chair will inform me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To suspend a rule requires the unanimous consent of the Senate in this particular case.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the title of the bill be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill which the Senator from Virginia has reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia will be reported by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 200) to authorize the purchase of the Aqueduct Bridge or the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, D. C.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator that he ask the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Well, sir, I am entirely willing to ask unanimous consent; but I am not willing to infract a rule. I claim that two-thirds of this body can change a rule; but I will withdraw that claim for the present and allow my bill to pass the Senate, if the Senate will just consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 200) to authorize the purchase of the Aqueduct Bridge or the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, D. C.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It will be observed that the committee has reported one amendment to the bill which passed at the last session of Congress. The committee propose "six months" instead of three months as the time within which the title shall be obtained to the Aqueduct Bridge. I ask that that be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 3, after the word "within," it is proposed to strike out "ninety days" and insert "six months;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That if the provisions of the first section of this act authorizing the purchase of the Aqueduct Bridge shall not be fully executed within six months from the passage of this act and the title therefor approved as herein required, then the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, above Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, a substantial iron and masonry bridge, with approaches; and the sum of $220,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of said bridge and approaches, the same to be maintained as a free bridge for travel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS HOT SPRINGS.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate at this time to call up the resolution submitted by me on the 21st instant in relation to the Government reservation at Hot Springs, Ark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the leases heretofore made of the bath-house and hot-water privileges upon the reservation of Government lands at Hot Springs, Ark., have expired by limitation of law;

Whereas the Attorney-General of the United States has given an opinion that such leases may be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior without additional legislation:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the opinion of Congress such leases of bath-house and hot-water privileges should not be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior until proper legislation is had with reference thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes to explain the reasons why I hope the resolution just read will pass the Senate.

By an act of Congress approved in December, 1878, the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to lease to the owners certain bath-houses located upon the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Ark., and also to lease bath-house sites for a period of five years. The same act authorized the Secretary of the Interior to lease the Arlington Hotel to the proprietors for a period of ten years. The leases made under this act, so far as they relate to the bath-houses, expired in December, 1883. The Secretary of the Interior at that time, the present Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], decided that he had no power to renew those leases. He, however, permitted the parties who held under the former leases to retain possession as tenants at will upon the same terms as those that were provided for in the former leases. In October, 1885, the Attorney-General gave an opinion that the Secretary of the Interior did have the power under the act of 1878 to renew these leases. This opinion, however, did not commit the Attorney-General to the policy of renewal.

About the 1st of last December I called upon the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, who had this matter in charge, and represented to him that I did not think it to the interest of the Government or the people of Hot Springs that these leases should be renewed. I said to him that I hoped for legislation during the present session of Congress which would change that entire system and would forever prevent its renewal. I clearly understood from him at that time that no renewal would be made until it was definitely ascertained that no legislation would be had during the present session. On last Friday I learned that there was a probability of some action being had in reference to this matter, and I called upon the Assistant Secretary again, and he informed me that one, if not two, of these leases had been renewed. I thereupon introduced the present resolution. I did not introduce it for the purpose of criticising or in any way reflecting upon the action of the Interior Department. I presume the Assistant Secretary either forgot or did not deem it any part of his duty to inform me of his change of intention. I introduced the resolution for the purpose, if possible, of preventing any further leases being granted, or in any event that I might put these lessees upon notice, so that they could not come in hereafter, and in order to defeat legislation claim that they had expended money or incurred obligations that it would be inequitable and unjust for Congress to disregard.

I shall not attempt, Mr. President, at this time to state at any length the reasons why I think that the whole system should be changed of controlling the reservation and disposing of the hot water at Hot Springs. I will state, however, that under the present system it would be utterly impossible to ever improve and beautify that reservation in order to make it a desirable resort for the invalids and visitors who may go to that watering-place. I believe that so long as those bath-houses remain upon that reservation and are occupied by those in charge of them with their families it is utterly impossible to keep the place in that sanitary condition necessary for the health and comfort of the people. To-day that reservation is made a general dumping-ground for all those articles which good taste requires should be kept from public view.

Another reason why I am opposed to the renewal of these leases is this: Under the present lease system there a few individuals, the owners of the Arlington Hotel, the owners of those bath-houses, have a complete monopoly over the hot water that is used and flows from the springs. In addition to that, under the present system, more than one-half, some say four-fifths, of that hot water escapes into the channel of the creek and is forever lost. I was going to remark, however, that so complete is this monopoly, that Captain Jacobs, of the United States Army, who had in charge the building of the Army and Navy hospital there, was compelled last summer to buy water for the United States Government for the construction of that building. I say while this hot water is allowed to escape not one of the citizens residing in the southern part of the city of Hot Springs, the most populous part of that city, is enabled to obtain a bath-house or a single gallon of hot water.

In addition to these reasons, Mr. President, the individuals who own these bath-house leases and this Arlington Hotel are not liable to pay any taxes for that property. They are practically the owners. They pay the Government a mere nominal rent. The Arlington Hotel cost perhaps $60,000; the bath-houses cost perhaps $100,000 or more; and the owners of this property are entitled to the benefit of the free schools, and they are entitled to protection from the State and municipal authorities, and yet upon this property they pay not one dollar of tax. So long as this monopoly is continued so long will there be strife and contention at the Hot Springs, and so long as strife and contention continue there so long will visitors and invalids be deterred from seeking that greatest health resort on the American continent.

While, as I have said, I have not fully matured any legislation on this point, while I am not prepared to commit myself fully at this time to any system, yet I believe that every bath-house and every hotel should be swept from that reservation, that no structures should remain thereon save and except the Army and Navy hospital, a building which is now about completed, a magnificent structure, and one that does much honor to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], through whose exertions the bill was passed that secured its erection. I say, that building should remain there, and perhaps a bath-house for the indigent invalids, but all others should be swept away. Further than that, the hot water should be collected in reservoirs, it should be distributed throughout the different parts of the city through pipes connected with the reservoirs, and the Government should pass out of the bath-house business, and simply dispose of this water to the citizens; and the Secretary of the Interior should direct that this water should be distributed through all parts of the city, so far as the supply will extend.

These are my views, and in presenting them I wish to say that I make no war upon the individual owners of these bath-houses or this Arlington Hotel. I know them personally. They are very clever gentlemen, but like most men who have special privileges conferred upon them they are disposed to look more to their own interest than they are to that of the public. I make war on this system or any system that gives a few individuals the monopoly of these privileges and exempts them from taxation.

I may add, however, that for the present and in the adoption of this resolution I do not seek to convert any Senator to my way of thinking in regard to the final disposition of this matter. I speak for the present only to prevent these leases being renewed, to prevent these parties from obtaining additional rights to those which they now have, to prevent these parties from coming in hereafter and claiming that they are entitled to equities. I ask that the matter rest as it is and that these leases be not renewed, or at least that Congress express that opinion which I hope and believe the Secretary of the Interior will regard until such time as a bill can be brought in and this matter can be thoroughly considered by the present Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to hear the resolution read. I was not in when it was offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course the Senator from Arkansas knows much more about this matter than I do; but the language of the resolution would in my judgment do nothing more than suspend this leasing for almost an unlimited time. It took quite a number of years to get Congress to do anything in reference to the Hot Springs in Arkansas. One of the Senators from Arkansas for a number of sessions I think, or for at least two or three, tried to obtain appropriations for that locality for certain purposes and failed, for the reason that it was almost impossible to attract the attention of Congress to that particular thing, as every one knows it is very hard sometimes in reference to many other things unless they are of an overwhelming public character.

I desire, so far as I am concerned, to see the best mode adopted that could be devised for the general benefit of the people who go there. I think if the Senator will reflect a little in reference to the suggestion made in the resolution that he may change it. The idea he suggests to the Senate is that this hot water should be so arranged by the Government that through pipes it would go to the houses of all the citizens of the town, so that they might all receive benefit therefrom. Would not that produce this result, that the citizens of Hot Springs would get this water if it was put in tanks or in a reservoir for their benefit, and would they not sell it for a much larger amount than individuals have to pay for baths now? Human nature is a good deal alike everywhere, and giving a privilege to one individual sometimes works a hardship to others; but if you were to give the privilege to those whom it works hardest against they would do precisely the same thing, and thus produce the hardship that they had objected to.

I was once at the Hot Springs for a short time, and I must say I received great benefit from those waters. While there I came to the conclusion that it would be very difficult to regulate the matter by law; that is, to define it in such a way that everybody would have an equal share in the waters of those springs; and I came to the conclusion that there could be no better way than to leave it in the control of the Secretary of the Interior. If the Secretary of the Interior is a just man, which doubtless he is, a man of good judgment, of discretion, a man who desires to deal fairly and justly with all, he will certainly make such rules and regulations connected with the use of the water—as he has a perfect right, as I understand, to do under the law—as will be equitable and just to all the citizens.

One of the difficulties, at least one that I found, was this: There are a great number of bath-houses at the Hot Springs receiving this water, all leased from the Government. I believe they are not allowed to have in excess of forty tubs to a bath-house. I do not know how many there are there, but I think there are some ten or twelve bath-houses, certainly a number that accommodate many people, and a great many people go there for their health. You may call the matter a monopoly or what you please; but the bathing is good, and the bath-houses are kept in a cleanly condition; there are rubbers and servants there whom you can employ for the purpose of attending to your wants, and so far as I observed in connection with the bath-houses everything was cleanly and in good shape.

Now suppose it is a monopoly; everything for which a person has a privilege you may say is a monopoly; but really it is only a monopoly when you declare that nobody shall have a right except a particular individual. That is not the case there. These persons lease a piece of ground, they build a bath-house at their own expense, and then as the remuneration they are to receive to compensate them for the expense they have been at in building a bath-house they charge so much for each bath, 25 cents or 50 cents or whatever it is—I do not remember now——

Mr. BERRY. Thirty-five cents.

Mr. LOGAN. No matter what the amount is, they charge so much in order to remunerate them for their outlay. Unless some one can devise a plan and bring it to the attention of Congress that is better than the present arrangement, I would rather see the present arrangement continued. I certainly would join with the Senator from Arkansas in any plan or in any system that could be devised by which people would be accommodated in a better manner than they are at the present time.

What I am saying is not with a view of antagonizing anything that would be a benefit to the invalid, for it is to the invalid that I look much more than to the men who lease the bath-houses or citizens who would be benefited thereby. If he would change this resolution so as to suspend the leasing, say for one month or for weeks or two months, to see what Congress will do, and if Congress takes no definite step in that length of time then let the suspension cease, I should see no particular objection to it; but I say to him now and to the Senate that I think when you undertake to bring this to the attention of Congress you will find Congress perhaps will not come up to the work as readily as you suppose.

I know that a Senator representing that part of the country knows much more about this matter than I do. I merely rose to make this suggestion, that the Senator would find more difficulty perhaps in having a plan arranged and devised and passed through Congress than he anticipates now. Hence I think if the resolution is to pass suspending indefinitely the action of the Secretary of the Interior, it would work harm instead of good.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I think this resolution ought not to pass, at this time at least. As I understand the situation in the Department, it is this: The Attorney-General of the United States has given it as his opinion that under the existing law the Secretary of the Interior may in his discretion extend these leases or not. The present Attorney-General has given his opinion that the Secretary of the Interior may or may not, as he chooses, extend these leases. I am willing that that discretion should abide there, and I am not willing to take it away, for, after paying the closest possible attention to the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas, it seems to me his resolution embraces the idea of confiscating all the bath-houses on the hot-water reservation. I can conceive of nothing except an act of confiscation that would strike my mind as more unjust. There are bath-houses there with tens upon tens of thousands of dollars in them. I do not know but that some of them have cost their proprietors $100,000. There is one bath-house where each tub has cost the proprietors $150 to put it in its place, made in Scotland and inlaid with porcelain, the finest bath-house to-day perhaps in the world, certainly in the United States. If that man's lease is not to be renewed and his property is to be taken off that reservation, it strikes me as simply a sweeping act of confiscation.

Mr. INGALLS. When do these leases expire?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not know definitely when any of them expire, but——

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me to state?

Mr. VOORHEES. They will be expiring soon.

Mr. BERRY. The leases have already expired. The proposition is to prevent their renewal, in order that their holders may not be able to come forward in the view the Senator from Indiana is contending for them and set up their equities to prevent legislation. The leases have expired.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator knows that point better than I. Very well, then, I will say that I am perfectly ready and willing to consider carefully any measure of legislation that the Senator from Arkansas or anybody else will bring forward on this subject; but I am not willing to make proclamation in advance as to what we will do. I am not willing to bind myself by a joint resolution to destroy the present investment without any knowledge of what is to take its place. I say, with all respect to the Senator from Arkansas, and with a good deal of knowledge and experience of that locality, that a proposition to take the bath-houses off the ground where they are now, where the hot springs in many instances bubble into them from the ground, and then pipe that water to distant parts of the reservation, is simply to destroy it in my judgment. That is the way it looks to me.

I think the better way would be, if the Senator from Arkansas will allow me to suggest it, that some measure of legislation embodying the ideas we are expected to act upon should be brought forward, rather than this notification of what we are going to do, without any particulars.

So far as my participating in this matter is concerned, I desire to say and call the attention of the Senate to the fact that every Senator is as much interested in behalf of his constituents in this Government reservation as the Senator from Arkansas. It is a Government reservation in Arkansas; but it is Government property; it is public property; it is there for the public welfare, for the general good, and we are all interested in the subject, for I have met as many people from New England as I have from any portion of the United States there having the benefit of these magical hot waters. It is really, Mr. President, the greatest sanitarium on the globe. I have met gentlemen and ladies both who have sought health in all the famous resorts of Europe, who at last have come there and found what they have sought in vain everywhere else; and the utmost care and consideration should be extended to this great interest.

I hope the Senate will not commit itself in any haste upon this subject. For the time being at least it is in safe hands. The Attorney-General having decided that the matter is one of discretion with the Secretary of the Interior, we are in no danger in leaving it there until some measure of legislation shall be perfected.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I distinctly stated that this resolution did not commit any Senator to the plan of removing the bath-houses from the reservation. I stated, furthermore, that my present impression was that that was the best plan, but that I had not fully matured a measure upon the subject.

The Senator from Indiana says we ought not to commit the Senate until it can be seen if legislation will be had. That is precisely what I seek to do by this resolution. It simply asks that the present status remain unchanged until it can be determined whether or not Congress will legislate.

I can see no injury to result to the gentlemen who own these bath-houses, because they are holding the bath-houses to-day on the same terms that would be included in a new lease if it were granted. What injury possibly can result to them? They hold the bath-houses on the identical terms that the new leases would contain. We only ask that these gentlemen be not granted rights and privileges now under which they could set up equities hereafter to defeat legislation. That is the object and purpose, and the sole purpose.

The Senator from Indiana says if these bath-houses were removed from there it would be confiscation. Mr. President, the Attorney-General in that same opinion decides that at the expiration of the leases this property was the property of the Government of the United States. They took their chances when they built those bath-houses. They took them for a period of five years, and until the opinion of Attorney-General Garland was delivered in October no one expected that there was any power within the Secretary of the Interior to renew these leases. All that we ask now is that the Secretary of the Interior shall not renew the leases, that he do not confer any additional right until it can be seen whether or not Congress will legislate on the subject.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, these waters at the Hot Springs are for the healing of the nation. They were of such recognized sanitary value that the Government of the United States took possession of them, and they now flow upon a public reservation. I understand that the administration under the system which was provided by Congress has up to this time been entirely satisfactory; but I am aware also that there is now, as there always has been, a studied and persistent effort on the part of private speculators to obtain possession of these waters for purposes of private gain. I think myself that the Government having taken possession of these springs, and having thus far administered them for the benefit of the entire people, there being no complaint so far as I know about the price that is charged for the baths or about the accommodations that are furnished for guests, we should not attempt any novel experiments in this business. I am willing that they should remain, where they now remain, in the custody of the Government of the United States under an officer as enlightened, as efficient, and as sincerely devoted to the public welfare as is the Secretary of the Interior. I am not willing that after the great struggle we had here six or eight years ago to obtain possession of these waters they shall be remanded again into the domain of private speculation, and that Congress shall be invited to legislate upon some scheme which may possibly result in the Government finally losing control altogether.

I was not aware that these leases had expired. I find in response to my inquiry that they have expired, and therefore the springs are now practically in the custody of the Government under a proposition, as I suppose, for a renewal. There should not be a renewal under any circumstances that would be onerous to the public. I admit that, and I therefore move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, if that be the appropriate committee, for the purpose of examining into the subject and reporting what legislation, if any, is necessary in the premises.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, it seems to me that the discussion has drifted away from the sole point in this resolution. The Senator from Kansas expresses a very great desire that the Government shall not lose control of these waters. This resolution is intended to accomplish exactly that purpose. Under the legislation under which this matter has been managed for five years past provision was made for certain individuals having the control of certain lots of land granted to them by the Secretary of the Interior for a term of five years. These leases have expired. The lease-holders certainly had rights during those five years of time. Those rights are now out. The Government has properly the control of all this water; yet these parties remain in control of the bath-houses and are controlling the hot water just as they did while their leases went on; and all this is subject to the will of the Government of the United States. This proposition is to keep it in exactly that condition, to keep these bath-houses and all these rights subject to whatever legislation Congress may see proper to make.

If the Secretary of the Interior is allowed to go on and renew these leases and give these parties the right to hold the property for five years to come, that takes it out of the control of Congress for that length of time, for if they have the right to retain the leases for that time we can not interfere with any vested rights. If there is a reservation in the lease keeping the rights of the Government intact, then there can be no harm done to any of these parties, because they are absolutely lessees at will. They are lessees at will as the matter stands. There can be no question about this. The renewal could have no effect except to raise the question whether they were lessees at will or had vested rights for five years to come.

There is no good sense, it seems to me, in giving away this right of the Government and allowing these people this additional claim to a vested right. It seems to me proper for Congress to say there shall be no change in the present status until there shall be a declaration on the part of the legislative department of the Government of what its will will be in the management of this hot water.

It is entirely unnecessary to discuss now what policy the Government will pursue as to the management of the hot water. That must be matured in legislation yet to come. I have my own convictions as to what is best to be done; other gentlemen have theirs; but our opinions, whatever they may, ought to have no effect upon this matter until Congress acts. The point to be accomplished now is that we, having possession of the reservation and of the hot water, shall retain that possession until we see fit to take some definite and final action. That is the sole purpose of this resolution, and it seems to me the views expressed by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Indiana as well as the Senator from Kansas are all met by this resolution, and there can be no reasonable objection to its passage.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to ask him is it not probable, is it not almost certain, that if some bill regulating this matter were introduced and pending, the Secretary of the Interior without any such resolution as is now before the Senate would allow matters to stand in statu quo until he saw whether Congress took any action?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. My colleague was under the impression that such would be the case, and for that reason he called on the Assistant Secretary of the Interior having charge of this matter before the session began and requested that no steps should be taken by the Interior Department until it was apparent that this Congress would or would not adopt some sort of legislation; but, to his surprise, on Friday last he found that notwithstanding the agreement, as he understood it to be, between himself and the Assistant Secretary, there had been one or two leases already made. He believed they ought not to be made, and if these parties get in by their leases they certainly will insist that the Government has no power to divest them of whatever rights they have under their leases by any subsequent legislation. It is to prevent this thing going any further that the resolution was introduced by my colleague.

Mr. VOORHEES. What injury to the public interest—and that is the only interest to be considered in connection with these waters—would accrue if these leases were all renewed for five years more, with those splendid bath-houses as they are now accommodating everybody?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. In answer to the Senator from Indiana I will say that it gives the half-dozen individuals who control these bath-houses the absolute control of a great national sanitarium that was intended for the benefit of all mankind, that was intended in the eloquent language of the Senator from Kansas for the healing of the nations, and instead of belonging to the Government or to Congress it belongs to a half-dozen individuals, who manage and control it for their own private interest.

Mr. VOORHEES. Pardon me, it does not belong to them; they are limited in their charges by the Government, and whenever that is the case there is no absolute property in them. They are there trustees for that water, and are allowed to charge only so much, and if that is a monopoly I do know what a monopoly is. I do not see how it is possible for the waters to be used except in the hands of somebody. They are placed in the hands of these people who have put their money in them, built these splendid bath-houses, and are limited by the Government to a certain stipend from each bather.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. In reply to what the Senator from Indiana has just said, I wish to remark that when the representative of the Government of the United States who has charge of the great hospital there, that was inaugurated, I believe, on the motion of the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. LOGAN], proposed to use some of the hot water that we are told here belongs to the public and is not in any sense a monopoly, he had to pay the individuals who control it. If they do not own it, how does that come about?

Mr. VOORHEES. What affliction is the Government laboring under that it needs this hot water? What does it want the hot water for?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I refer that to the Senator from Illinois, who was the originator of the hospital.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not understand that the Government wants it.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The waters are needed for the hospital.

Mr. VOORHEES. I know all about that hospital.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Then why ask the question?

Mr. VOORHEES. To see whether you know anything about it. [Laughter.] The Senator from Illinois is justly credited with that great work, for he was on the Appropriations Committee and carried it through, but I might contest priority, I know, on the point of invention, even with him, for the building of that hospital and the covering of that stream which runs through the valley, but in the building of that splendid hospital, which is an honor to the Government and a credit to the humanity and benevolence of the age, I do not know of any use they would have for the hot water unless they had patients there. They will be entitled to the hot water as soon as they have wards and bath-rooms and tubs there; but prior to that, for any building purposes connected with its construction, I can not imagine what hot water was needed for.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator a question if he will yield.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. If matters should remain in statu quo would the Government have to buy the hot water for the hospital?

Mr. VOORHEES. Undoubtedly not.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Then why has it had to buy it?

Mr. VOORHEES. The Government owns the hot water and does not buy it now.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. It did so.

Mr. VROOHEES. Then it made a fool's contract.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. That may be, and I think this resolution will prevent the Government making another such a foolish contract as that; and that is a reason for passing the resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. I as well as the Senator from Indiana do not understand this statement about the Government having to purchase hot water for the Government hospital. For what purposes did they have to purchase it?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I suppose for the purpose of construction.

Mr. LOGAN. Of erection?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I presume so.

Mr. LOGAN. Then all I have to say is that if any superintendent of the hospital for the purpose of construction purchased that water, it was a fraud on the Government. I will say that, because there are thousands of barrels of that hot water wasted every day, and below where there are any hospitals at all there are hot springs and hot water and it goes off in immense quantities. If the water was wanted merely for construction and he paid for it, he did that which he had no right to do. It was an imposition on the Government.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. My impression on that point is this: These hot springs come out, as the Senator very well knows, at a point higher than the location of the hospital. The water he speaks of that goes to waste runs at the foot of the mountain. It would be perhaps cheaper to buy the privilege from those who claim to own the springs and have the water go directly to the hospital than to have it pumped or drawn by horse-power or other means from the creek below. That might be a mere matter of expediency. The point I make is that the water is certainly not free while the agent of the Government can not control it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to announce that the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the unfinished business is now before the Senate, being the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent that the regular order be postponed or informally laid aside, or whatever the proper order is, until the resolution is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be laid aside informally with a view to conclude the consideration of the resolution which has been before the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the request can not be entertained.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 19th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 128) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a duplicate certificate of deposit to the People's National Bank of Lawrenceburg, Ind.;

An act (S. 471) to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President; and

An act (S. 602) to legalize the election of the Territorial Legislative Assembly of Wyoming.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 3827) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Rosser;

A bill (H. R. 3846) to remove the disabilities of Alexander P. Stewart, of La Fayette County, Mississippi; and

A bill (H. R. 4409) to remove the disabilities of Edward G. W. Butler, of Missouri.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 16) granting a pension to Mrs. Nancy L. Ribble;

A bill (H. R. 414) granting a pension to Daniel B. Clark;

A bill (H. R. 551) granting a pension to Rhoda Dane;

A bill (H. R. 602) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna D. W. Eichman;

A bill (H. R. 634) granting a pension to John Defenbaugh;

A bill (H. R. 646) granting a pension to Thomas M. Commuck;

A bill (H. R. 650) granting an increase of pension to Charlotte D. Crocker;

A bill (H. R. 693) to restore to the pension-roll the name of William B. Keith;

A bill (H. R. 698) granting a pension to Phillip D. Campbell;

A bill (H. R. 700) granting a pension to Mrs. M. A. Bickerdyke;

A bill (H. R. 702) granting a pension to Dr. J. F. Bruner;

A bill (H. R. 758) granting a pension to Alexander Harper;

A bill (H. R. 802) granting a pension to August Schindler;

A bill (H. R. 1468) increasing the pension of John P. Davis;

A bill (H. R. 1475) granting a pension to Margaret Flaherty; and

A bill (H. R. 4410) for the relief of John C. Clark.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 57) to print an addition to a report on wages, ordered printed January 17, 1884, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS IN MINNESOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 16th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of proposed legislation providing for negotiations with the various tribes and bands of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, with a view to the improvement of their present condition.

It is requested that the matter may have early attention, consideration, and action by Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 25, 1886.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF ELECTRICIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of State, which is accompanied by the report of the United States electrical commission of the proceedings of the national conference of electricians held at the city of Philadelphia in the month of September, 1884.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 25, 1886.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator from Alabama to consent to my getting the bill informally laid aside that we may finish the Sioux bill. I do not think there is going to be very lengthy debate upon the Sioux bill. It has been before the Senate now for a week in the morning hour, and I have not felt like asking the laying aside of the regular order heretofore.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no charge of the bill upon which I am about to submit a few remarks. The charge of the bill, I believe, is in the hands of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and I do not care to interfere with the progress of the bill one way or the other.

Mr. HOAR. I hope we shall finish the electoral-count bill. It has been before the Senate four or five days, and been very thoroughly debated in former years and passed with great unanimity. It seems to me we ought to dispose of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the question upon which I desire to submit some remarks is fully presented in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio who occupies the chair [Mr. SHERMAN], proposed to become section 5 of the bill; and, as my remarks will bear almost entirely upon that feature, I send it to the desk that the Secretary may read that proposed amendment.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment of Mr. SHERMAN, as follows:

SEC. 5. If it shall appear from the action of the two Houses that they disagree upon any question submitted to them under the provisions of the preceding section, then the members of the two Houses, in joint convention, shall immediately, without debate, upon the roll-call of the respective Houses, vote upon the question or questions upon which there has been such a disagreement, and the decision of the majority of the members of the joint convention present shall be deemed final and conclusive, and the vote shall be counted accordingly and be announced by the President of the Senate.

That while the two Houses shall be in meeting as provided in this act the President of the Senate shall have power to preserve order; and no debate shall be allowed and no question shall be put by the presiding officer except to either House on a motion to withdraw, or upon questions upon which the two Houses have disagreed as aforesaid.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the bill reported by the committee has been frequently before the Senate, and has been heretofore discussed by many members of this body, and has been three times in substance voted upon by the Senate. In each instance the principles of this bill have been adopted by the Senate, on the last occasion without a division, and on each of the preceding occasions by a very decided majority. The first time the question arose in the Senate since I have been here it came up in the form of a concurrent resolution, which I had the honor to report from a select committee of this body when the Senate was Democratic.

The identical proposition which is antagonized by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York was presented in that concurrent resolution, I think in the very language in which it is presented in this bill. The Democratic Senate, largely aided by Republican votes in this body, passed that resolution, as I remember. It went to a Republican House and they refused to concur in it. Indeed they filibustered in the House to prevent action upon it. Afterward, when the Senate became Republican, the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] brought forward this same proposition, and the bill was passed. It then went to a Democratic House and failed of consideration. I believe that it never came back from the committee to which it was referred, or, if it did come back, it was not considered by the House.

So in the debate on this question we may all assume that there is no political controversy involved, and that we are trying to find the boundary and measure of our powers under the Constitution of the Constitution in respect to this very important matter.

From the foundation of the Government, or rather from the adoption of the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, this has always been an interesting question, and questions have arisen in the count of electoral votes for President frequently which both Houses have found it necessary to evade a decision upon by passing the resolutions referred to in the remarks of the Senator from Ohio.

I have heard it very frequently stated in debate, and more frequently in private conversation with Senators and others, that the Constitution of the United States needs further amendment upon this subject. I do not concede that there is any occasion for any further amendment of the Constitution. On the contrary, I believe that the highest wisdom has been displayed not merely by the original convention which adopted the Constitution, but also bythe Legislatures of the States and by the Congress which adopted the twelfth amendment to the Constitution. That original article was formed, and the twelfth amendment was adopted as a substitute for it, at a time when men who understood the whole scope and purpose of the Constitution of the United States were present in the respective bodies.

It is scarcely prudent in us to say that we now find at a later day that they have so contrived to confuse this great subject of the election of a President of the United States as to leave difficulties in it which must be removed and can only be removed by a constitutional ordinance or amendment. We are too apt in considering a question arising upon the twelfth amendment of the Constitution to look alone at the particular clause under discussion, and not to take in view the whole purpose of that amendment. We are too apt also to forget the fact that the States of the American Union, and not the people of the States, appoint the electors to choose a President and a Vice-President. We are too apt to forget that the office of elector in its original institution was intended to be a great and an independent office, in which the electors would be called upon and authorized to express their own personal conviction, if they chose to do so, as to the persons who ought to be selected for President and Vice-President of the United States.

The influence of popular opinion in the United States is so potent, so irresistible, and has interwoven itself so thoroughly with this question of the election of electors of President and Vice-President that they have got to be in popular estimation mere dummies, mere agents for the purpose of expressing the will of a partisan majority in this entire country. I do not know that I shall ever make an effort to reverse that tide of public opinion which has entirely subordinated and almost extinguished the high office of elector in the United States; at the same time, when we come to consider the constitutional questions with which we have the liberty of dealing, I must revert to the original character and power and authority and independence of this great office of elector of President and Vice-President of the United States, and still claim for them the full measure of their rights and independence as they are established in the Constitution.

In doing this I hope that in some future day of trouble I will be found to have done my duty to the country.

I find on looking into the meaning of the Constitution, as displayed in the twelfth amendment and in other parts bearing closely upon this subject, that there are three distinct electoral bodies, if not four, mentioned in the Constitution, each one in succession taking its turn in choosing a President and Vice-President according to the circumstances upon which its jurisdiction and authority arise, to act for whom? Not the people of the United States considered as people, but separately for the States of the American Union. The first electoral body is composed of the electors chosen by the States in such manner as the States by their legislatures shall prescribe. They compose the voting duties of the electoral college, as I call it, of the first degree.

Another tribunal, however, was made necessary to ascertain what votes these electors cast, the persons for whom they were cast, and to ascertain the result and perhaps to decide it. The two tribunals, one to vote and the other to count, were necessary from the fact that, in order to secure the absolute independence of the electors in the respective States the Constitution requires that the electoral vote shall be cast in those States. In order that the power of New York, for instance, with its great and dominant supremacy in commerce as well as in other respects, might not overawe the power of a State like Colorado, the requirement of the Constitution is that the electoral votes shall be cast in the respective States. That preserves the independence of the electors and enables the State government and the people of the State to supervise and secure the independence and the integrity of the action of their own chosen electors. That, of course, rendered it necessary that when these voters had voted another tribunal should be established in the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of counting the votes and ascertaining the result, and the two together compose the electoral body of the first degree, as I have said.

All the controversy that arises under this bill and the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio relates to the construction of some of the words which give power and jurisdiction to the counting tribunal of this first electoral college; but great light is to be reflected upon the determination of these constitutional questions by reference to the organization of the entire body of electoral colleges which may assemble, one after another, under that system.

The electoral college of the second degree is the House of Representatives which may then be in commission, composed of the members who have been elected and qualified in that House.

The electoral body of the third degree is the Senate of the United States acting separately, but only upon condition that the House has failed to elect a President; the first electoral body having also failed to elect a President; and then the Senate of the United States, acting as a separate electoral body and casting its vote not by States but per capita, chooses a Vice-President of the United States; and if on the 4th of March succeeding the general election there is no President of the United States chosen according to the Constitution, that Vice-President becomes President of the United States, as the law is now, for the full term from the 4th of March after his election, for four years. Therefore the Senate of the United States becomes in such an event an electoral body, having conferred upon it by the Constitution the powers of electors, which it exercises by a vote per capita in this Chamber.

The fourth electoral body, which perhaps is not less distinctively made such in the Constitution, is the Congress of the United States, which has what I term electoral power, for that is the nature of it as I conceive, to fill up a vacancy when one has occurred both in the office of President and Vice-President. That must be done by a law, and only recently both Houses have passed a law, and the President I understand has signed it, so that it is now the law of the land, by which the succession of the Presidency at the hands of this fourth electoral body has been changed entirely from the officers that were formerly qualified to hold it into the hands of the Cabinet ministers of the United States in a certain succession mentioned therein.

Then we have four distinct electoral bodies. Let me ask the Senate the question, When either of these electoral bodies finds itself possessed of a particular power defined and settled in the Constitution itself, can any other body in the United States interfere with them? Can the judiciary interfere with them? Can Congress by legislation interfere with them? Can anybody in the United States deprive that electoral body of its constitutional rights as defined therein? Why were these four electoral bodies ordained? Obviously because the first might fail and the second might fail, and if the second fails the third might proceed; and the third might fail and the fourth might proceed, and thereby secure not merely the perpetuity of the Government, but the transmission of the executive power from hand to hand without obstruction, without friction, and without danger.

Sir, with this grand scheme standing before us thus ordained and established and nicely adjusted in the Constitution of the United States we should be wary how we interfere so as to give the slightest disturbance to it. I for one confess that I see no occasion for a constitutional amendment, for I see in this wise and conservative action of the founders of our Government and of the Congress and the people who afterward amended the Constitution by the twelfth article perfect security for the transmission of the Presidency from hand to hand through all the coming generations of men that shall ever enjoy the blessings of this great Government.

After this definition of the general subject I propose to address my remarks to the precise question before the Senate, which is embodied in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, which is that we should usurp into the hands of Congress a power that is not given to us in the Constitution, and a power the exercise of which under the proposed amendment of this bill would tear down and destroy the first of these electoral bodies.

The leading provisions of this act relate to and are intended to execute the single clause in the twelfth amendment of the Constitution in these words, "and the votes shall then be counted."

The duty thus enjoined is mandatory and is also peremptory, and rests with all its grave responsibilities on the oath-bound consciences of all persons concerned in counting the votes. No person who is not a Senator or Representative, except the President of the Senate (who may not be a Senator), can participate in counting the votes.

The Constitution requires that the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be present when the votes of the electors are opened and counted, but is silent as to the number of Senators or Representatives who shall be present. Upon the principle of the inclusion of the one there is necessarily to be implied the exclusion of the other. When we find that the Constitution says that the Senate and the House of Representatives shall be present at the opening and counting of these votes, it means that no other tribunal can be there, to say the least of it, and participate in that count.

The number of individual members of either House required to be present is mentioned in the twelfth amendment, where each House is resolved by the mandate and force of the Constitution into a separate electoral body, so that the Constitution, when it is silent as to the number required to compose a house to be present at the count of the votes under the twelfth amendment must refer for the number required to be present to section 5, Article I, which provides that a majority of each House shall constitute "a quorum to do business." This means in both Houses a majority of all the elected and qualified members. When the Senate and the House of Representatives meet to count the votes, or to hear them counted, they are and must be as complete and separate in their constitutional organization as they are when they are in session in their respective Chambers.

I think I need scarcely remind you that a voluntary assemblage of Senators and Representatives, though met on the day appointed by law or by resolution of the Houses for the counting of the votes, without being organized under the presidency of the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, could scarcely be called the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States. Suppose, sir, that in the absence of the Speaker the members of the House should assemble there, or in the absence of our President the members of the Senate should assemble there, would that be considered a meeting of the House and Senate within the meaning of this requirement of the Constitution of the United States? According to the Constitution, each House when they are so in meeting remains under the presidency of its own officer. We frequently hear it stated that the President of the Senate is the president of the joint meeting. If he is, it is only by reason of some rule or agreement between the two Houses. The Constitution is silent upon that point. The Constitution speaks of no officer who is to preside over the joint meeting.

The Constitution does not any more disqualify the Speaker from presiding over the House when the Houses are met than it authorizes the President of the Senate to preside over the House, and there is no presiding officer named in the Constitution on that occasion for either body. It is a house, and that is enough. To be a house in parliamentary law and in constitutional law it must be organized under the presidency of its rightful officer. The Constitution merely confers on the President of the Senate the special duty of opening all the certificates, which it requires shall be transmitted to him, of the persons voted for for President and Vice-President.

The House is here, we will say, assembled on that side of this Chamber, its Speaker presiding. The Senate is here assembled on this side, its President presiding. That fulfills the Constitution to the letter and in spirit also, and the President of the Senate can not even call the Houses to order except by common consent. His duty as fixed in the Constitution is that in the presence of the two Houses he shall open the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. This is the whole of it. That act certainly would not disorganize the Senate. That act has no tendency to disorganize the Senate. The President of the Senate may perform this act of opening the certificates, handing them to the tellers, or whoever else is required by law to receive them, without the slightest impression upon the organization of the Senate. On the contrary, the Senate must be present, as such, when this act is performed, in order to make it valid.

The opening of the certificates of election sent to him by the express mandate of the Constitution—for he is named in the Constitution as the person to whom they are to be sent—is a duty outside of his duty as President of the Senate under other circumstances, outside of any legislative or parliamentary control of the body, and it has not, I repeat, the slightest tendency to disorganize the body, nor can any inference be drawn from the duty imposed on him on that occasion that the Senate is not the Senate when met in the presence of the House.

So far there is no hint in the Constitution of the dissolution of either House into its original elements, nor of a common membership in both Houses of the persons who belong to each House. On the contrary, the Houses, as such, must be present when each and every vote is opened and counted, and it must be in session with a quorum to do business. No other business could then be in order when the Houses are in meeting but the opening and counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, because the Constitution requires the Houses to be present on that business. And it nowhere authorizes them to be present with each other on any other business. So that the sole business the Houses have to deal with is the opening and the counting of the votes, and that business must be performed by them as Houses, and not through the individual membership of each House, without organization, or in some blended arrangement.

I am asked by the honorable Senator from Mississippi what function they perform. I did not intend to spread my argument over that view of the case, because it was not necessary to the point that I am debating.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. MORGAN. I have my views about the function they perform, but it is not necessary that I should express them now. I can say, however, that they can not perform any other than constitutional functions.

Now, how this business may be transacted by the two Houses is a matter to be regulated by agreement, or by law, and is what this bill seeks to regulate. But it must be so conducted that a majority of each House shall declare the will of that House on every question that arises upon the business before them. That is a proposition that is considered self-evident. Each House, when in session, must in every case, where it takes any action, declare its will by a majority vote of "a quorum to do business," unless the Constitution otherwise directs. This is constitutional law, and it is also parliamentary law.

No House can through its membership declare its will otherwise than under its organization and pursuant to its constitution; and the will of a majority in each House fixes irrevocably the act of the House, so far as the binding of its membership is concerned, by the authority and influence of that will so expressed. Neither House, when in session, can permit a member of the other House to participate in its actions or deliberations. We can not invite any member of the House of Representatives to take a seat in this body and participate with us in our deliberations either in speaking, in making motions, or in voting. We have no such constitutional power and the House has no such constitutional power. We can take no cognizance of a member of the House of Representatives as being authorized to participate with us as an individual in any of our deliberations or actions. So, on the other hand, can not the House do the same thing.

So that, if the respective members of the Houses may vote together and in common on any question of counting or rejecting an electors' vote, it must be at a time and on an occasion when the Houses are not in session; it must be when the Houses are in recess or are adjourned; and yet we find that a House that is in recess or adjourned is not a House that can participate in the opening or counting of the electoral votes.

Let us see how the opposite idea of the Senator from Ohio would work. Here is the vote, I will say, from the State of Illinois, that determines the result of a Presidential election. It is not counted by the Houses. They have made the effort to count it under the proposed amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio as well as under this bill, and they have failed, because they have not agreed to count it. Being divided in opinion, they can not count it. Then, in order that it may be opened, if that is the question, or that it may be counted, if that is the question, and in effect the amendment of the Senator from Ohio requires that the Houses must dissolve, or recess, or adjourn, so that the will of the majority in each House, which has been just expressed, shall not bind its membership, and that each member may be permitted to find recruits to support his views, which were lost in the body to which he belongs, among the members of the other body. In this new, heterogeneous, and ungoverned assemblage of the disjecta membræ of the two Houses, no longer in session, the question is put, "Shall this package, purporting to be a certificate of votes of electors from Illinois, be opened, one certificate from that State having been already opened, but not counted?" The vote of the meeting is no.

The vote of the electors in that certificate is suppressed, and A is elected President instead of B by an act which is not done in the presence of the Houses, but in presence of a meeting of the members of both Houses. If the question is, "Shall the vote just opened be counted, notwithstanding there are other certified lists of votes of electors from Illinois that have been duly transmitted to the President of the Senate and have not been opened," and the vote of the meeting should be ay, that result would prohibit the opening or the counting of any other vote from Illinois, and would take from the President of the Senate the constitutional right to open the certificates, that came duly to his hands, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, because neither body would be present in a capacity to do business. A general meeting of members of both Houses would in the case I have supposed have overruled the action of one of the Houses and totally set aside its will as declared by its majority vote on precisely the same question.

If this notion of a new constitutional power is not drawn solely from the generous warmth and fertility of the imagination of the Senator from Ohio, he ought in justice to mention the great constitutional authority whose name must have escaped everybody's recollection except that of the honorable Senator, so as to inform the Senate of its authorship. To my apprehension it is entirely new.

The Senator from New York contents himself to support and re-enforce this new discovery of constitutional power to open certificates and count the votes of electors when the Houses are not present, but are adjourned, or in recess, or are dissolved, by the great weight, everywhere admitted, of his opinion, which he gives us in round full orb, without taking the trouble to display the analysis or the synthesis of the subject—of its root, its growth in logical development, or its progress of ripening in the warm sun of the splendid autumn of his wisdom.

The honorable Senator, whose coming here is welcomed by the country as a great power added to the Senate, is filled with a sudden dread that the Senate, when differing with the House of Representatives in counting a vote that would settle an election, might, by so differing, cause the House wickedly to make an opportunity to defeat a choice by the electors appointed by the States and seize the power to elect a President as the electoral body of the second degree provided by the Constitution. If we must grant, for the sake of the argument, that the members of the House could so readily disburden their consciences of the grave obligations of their oaths as to thus capture the position from which the House could dictate the succession in the Presidential office, it may be asked on what rule of probabilities is it ascertained that the danger to the Senate would be less when seventy-six Senators are voting pell-mell with three hundred and twenty-five Representatives than when the one vote of the Senate is equal to the one vote of a House that has set out to capture the Presidency by rejecting the vote of a State like New York, so that no candidate should receive a majority of the votes of all the electors appointed by the States?

The amendment of the Senator from Ohio provides for this mixed vote only in case the Houses have first disagreed in counting the vote of a State.

The Senator admits that it is the right of the two Houses to separate themselves, and as Houses to pass upon the question whether the vote of a State shall be opened or whether it shall be counted; but after they have separated and passed upon it and the Senate has expressed its will, which is binding everywhere upon the members of the Senate, when they meet again, after having disagreed, he proposes that by law the individual members of the Senate and of the House shall become what? The electoral body to choose a President of the United States. For, as was observed by the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] the other day, this question never becomes a significant or material one unless the particular act to be performed is one that would change the result of a Presidential election. Then there being two votes from a State, two sets of certificates, each certificate I will say under the great seal of the State, and both have been opened, the question is submitted to each House separately, Which of these votes will you count, which will you declare to be a vote emanating from the constitutional authority of the particular State? The Houses take the subject, they decide it each for itself, and they disagree and make a record of their disagreement, which record binds every member of each House, there being a majority vote in favor of a given proposition. After this solemn action on the part of both Houses, that question which is to decide the fate of a Presidential election is brought back before the individual membership of the two Houses.

Now let me ask if that question, thus pregnant with importance to the people of this country, which decides the fate of a Presidential election, is submitted to the men who are members of the House and members of the Senate to be voted upon per capita and to be decided according to the voice of the majority of that assemblage, is not that an electoral body? They are not legislatures; they could not consider the question of removing the disabilities from a rebel even though they might wish to do it; they have no function or duty there except in connection with the constitutional mandate that the vote shall be opened and counted in their presence.

But the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio, when it brings them together after the two Houses have failed to agree, confers upon them the authority of a new electoral body, and their vote elects the President of the United States. Thus the Constitution having ordained that there shall be four successive electoral bodies, and having given them powers that are intended to cover every emergency that can arise, the Senator from Ohio seeks to create a fifth electoral body, and thus amend the Constitution by an act of Congress.

Can there be a more towering threat or a greater danger to the limitations of constitutional organization and power than that which the honorable Senator from Ohio, sustained by the honorable Senator from New York, bring forward when they declare the right of Congress to create an electoral body, which the people have never chosen, with reference to the election of a President of the United States, and that that electoral body shall decide the question for the States absolutely, and in doing so override and break down the deliberate opinion, as voted and recorded, of one of the co-ordinate branches of the great legislative department of this country. Sir, I can only characterize it as a daring movement against the Constitution. It brings the electoral powers of the States into judgment before a tribunal to which the Constitution has never made them subject.

If it had been proposed that this question should be submitted to a committee of one hundred men to be appointed by the President of the Senate, we would have no more authority to do that than we have to confer upon this pell-mell organization the powers of an electoral body under the Constitution of the United States.

In the case of the wicked scheme suggested by the fears of the Senator from New York, if the House wishes to seize the Presidency it would first vote to exclude from the count the vote of a State which would deprive a candidate of a majority of all the votes of the electors appointed. This could only occur where the majority in the House were all ambitiously wicked or were corrupt. But in almost every such case the corrupt majority in the House (I dislike to indulge in such conjectures) would be strong enough to overbalance the minority with the votes of the virtuous element of the Senate added to it.

It ought to be taken into calculation also that perhaps a Senator is not, in a political sense, always altogether a virtuous man, and that the motives and incentives of a high ambition, or even the stimulating efficacy of party zeal, might cause a Senator, as it has sometimes, we believe, caused Supreme Court judges, to abandon the atmosphere of purity and simple justice and act on other motives in his desire to adhere to the dictates of a party in deciding a question relating to this great subject of a Presidential count. It is not to be calculated that every Senator who went into this political meeting would always vote for the right against his party. We are just as apt to find a corrupt Senate as we are to find a corrupt House, either in the past or in the future.

The Senate as a body, with its traditions now too proud, and its character too well established to admit of a voluntary disgrace, is stronger for the right and is a more powerful enemy to fraud and unholy ambition than its members individually could be when disbanded to take part in the tumult of a meeting, where the vote of two districts would equal the entire vote of the State if cast in the Senate.

If the House should, under this bill, as it is conjectured it might, seize the power to become the electoral body of the second degree, has it not occurred to the Senator from New York that in such a case the 325 votes would shrink to 38, to be distributed by the accident of majorities in the districts of the States respectively?

The doctrine of chances, which alarms the Senator from New York, would dismay a mountebank if he could see no clearer way to fleece his victim in a hundred trials of depraved trickery than the House would have to seize the Presidency through a scheme that has so startled the Senator from New York with its sudden and unexpected materialization, and has caused the Senator from Ohio to warm up with a new fervor of devotion to the rights of the people, whom we all know he loves so tenderly. The Senators can have no real occasion for alarm.

The Senate, in whose body the equal influence of a State can never be disturbed, is a safer guardian of the right which belongs to a State, and only to a State, to appoint electors to choose a President, than any other body, however constituted, in which the two Senators from New York would mingle their votes and dissipate their power among thirty-four Representatives. Both the Senators who have opposed the bill seem to regard with horror the fratricidal blow which destroys the vote of a State that both Houses can not agree to count. I share in their unhappiness, but it is sometimes unavoidable. They seem to forget that this result can only occur when there are two alleged States in the same limits, and that one can not live unless the other dies.

The bill of the honorable Senator from Vermont submits this question to the two Houses separately and their disagreement destroys the vote of the State, as we say, only in case there are two sets of returns regularly on their face under the Constitution, which it appears to be the duty of those who participate in the count to consider, and if the Houses can not agree upon that, of course the vote is lost. They seem to forget that this result can only occur when there are two alleged States in the same limits, and one can not live, as I have remarked, unless the other dies.

It is the painful duty of somebody to declare the survival of the fittest when two sets of electors from the same State send up in due form, according to the Constitution, two sets of lists and votes of electors, each regular on its face. And the real question seems to be whether we will decide the matter by constituted tribunals, according to usage and with the deliberation and composure of judges, or whether we will disband our court, join a mob, and inflict the death-penalty on the one we like the least. But it is asked, Why do you destroy the votes of both sets of electors because the Houses can not agree as to which of them is lawful? I answer, because the fault of the State has made it unavoidable. I answer further, distinctly and without reserve, that I take the ground of rejecting the vote of a State in such a case because that is the true course as indicated in the Constitution, and not because merely it is the best we can do under the circumstances.

There are four distinct electoral bodies under the Constitution, as I have argued.

I will add, for the sake of a clearer definition and to free the discussion from embarrassment, that the people are not, and under our Constitution can not be, electors of our President and Vice-President. Their powers, in every instance, are indirect, and are represented through their States and by the agents of the States, except that the people elect the members of the House of Representatives, who in voting for President represent their States.

A rule of constitutional law which would govern one of the electoral bodies of the first, second, or third degree ought, by analogy, to govern in either of the other two where the circumstances are alike. When the House votes for President, if ten of the Representatives from Illinois vote for A and ten vote for B, the vote of the State is balanced and entirely lost; and that according to the provision of the Constitution. So we find the Constitution, ex industria, providing for a case, when the House comes to vote (and they vote by States in the House), where the balance of the vote, the tie between the ten on one side and the ten on the other, annuls the voice of the State in the electoral count.

Shall we say in such case that the vote is lost by a tie in the electoral power in Illinois by the inability of the State to act? That is true if the power of the State expressed according to law is the true electoral power. If we say, however, that the true electoral power is the will of the majority of the people of Illinois as expressed in the ballot-box, the tie vote in the House, which expresses the will of each of the twenty Congressional districts, reverses and destroys the will of the State. Ten of these representatives may represent 100,000 more of the people of Illinois than the other ten. This is the destruction of the electoral power of Illinois, in the case supposed, by the act of her own electors who sit in the House—the electoral body of the second degree. If they can constitutionally destroy it by a tie vote, why may not the Houses destroy it? This is a greater evil and, as our history shows, far more dangerous to the public tranquillity than any that have startled the Senators who oppose this bill, and that seem to have frightened them into the still more dangerous expedient of dismembering the Senate in a case where so ruthless an act might seem to be a necessary sacrifice to save the electoral vote of a State.

But this precise method of destroying the electoral vote of a State by a tie vote of its members in the House is provided for in the Constitution. This may be styled the death of the electoral vote of a State per infortunium. Another method of destroying the electoral vote of a State by the act of the electors in the college of the second degree that the Constitution permits is where a State delegation in the House withdraws or fails to be present, which I suppose might be termed felo de se, or death with suicidal intent. A third method of destroying the entire power of the House to elect a President is for thirteen out of the thirty-eight States to be absent from the body, for it requires two-thirds of the States to have a representation on the floor of the House to constitute a quorum to elect a President. It also requires the vote of a majority of all the States, including those not present, at the election to choose a President. Thirteen of the States of the American Union finding that a person is to be elected whose election instead of executing reverses the public will, thirteen States finding that fraud has been perpetrated in one or both of the Houses in counting an electoral vote or in refusing to count it in order that the election may be devolved upon the House of Representatives, can quietly withdraw from that House and break its power.

Are not these ample guarantees to the minority and to the Senate that the mere brute force of three hundred and twenty-five men in the House shall not be successfully used to annul the power of the Senate in counting the votes of the electoral college of the first degree, and that the House can not have its own sweet will in choosing a President.

Another guarantee is that the House can only elect a President from the list of persons, not exceeding three, who have received the highest vote in the college of electors of the first degree.

Then comes the final guarantee to the Senate, which stands by as the electoral body of the third degree to execute the will of the States.

If the House fails to elect a President by the 4th day of March next succeeding the time of choosing electors fixed by law, the President elected by the Senate, voting per capita, shall, on the 4th March next after the general election, become, as the law now is, the acting President of the United States for the next full term.

Now, the whole scope and purpose of this bill is to provide in advance against possible or probable events that may give rise to trouble and friction in transferring the executive power from the hands of one person to those of another. The objections of the Senators from Ohio and New York consist mainly, if not entirely, in this specific difficulty, that the House of Representatives, in order to usurp the electoral power into their own hands, may dishonestly refuse to agree with the Senate in counting the votes of the electors of a State. Without respect to the inherent improbability of such a danger, is it not clear that the House would not once in a hundred or a thousand such events find itself able to exercise the power it had thus seized, as against the power of thirteen out of the thirty-eight States, to destroy the constitutional quorum?

Thirteen States out of thirty-eight can always remand the election of the real President to the Senate. Will it ever be that thirteen States will not be found that will meet a revolutionary and traitorous scheme of the majority to seize the Presidency, against the will of the people, by resorting to the simple, rightful, and constitutional duty of turning their backs upon the fraud, and of refusing to be present so as to aid in its consummation?

I confess that I look over this subject with exceeding gratification, and with increased veneration for the builders of our constitutional system, when I find that the Senate has been made the very keep and citadel of the rights and powers of the States, to preserve for them inviolate, and against all enemies, their great function of electing the President of the United States.

I would not, if I could, either by legislation or by constitutional amendment, lay hands on any part of this great system of successive electoral bodies, with their present wise adjustment; behind two of which the Senate stands as the third in degree, and more conservative than any, with powers adequate to save the country against any evil consequences that may arise from the disagreements of either of the electoral bodies of the first and second degree.

The Senate and the Supreme Court are our only perpetual bodies, and they are or should be far removed from all temptation to seize upon powers that are revolutionary or dangerous, or to surrender any powers that they rightfully have. The States are constantly finding in these bodies their shield of protection against encroachment and abuse. The States would not long survive in the Union the loss of these sheltering tribunals. In this bill there is but one sentiment, and that is to secure to each State its full electoral power, to be expressed and exercised, as far as may be, under the Constitution, through its own laws and through the final and conclusive judgment of its own tribunals. It is a bill worthy of the Senate, and recalls, with force, our attention to and our approval of the fact that this body is the still powerful and still consistent friend of the rights guaranteed to the States.

The States elect the President and Vice-President of the United States, and this bill is well adapted to secure to every State the free and final power to declare its choice through its own methods and authorities. If they are unwilling to take part in any election they can not be forced to do so. If faction dominates the State so that its true voice is difficult to distinguish, its own tribunals can decide and should decide the controversy, and make its decision, whether right or wrong in the light of prevailing opinions elsewhere, still final and conclusive on everybody.

If political revolt within a State has instituted dual governments there, one de facto and the other de jure, so that two returns are sent to the President of the Senate, somebody must decide which is the true return from the true State.

That tribunal must be the Houses, as only the Senate and House of Representatives can be present with authority at the count of the vote.

This tribunal is essentially appellate in such a juncture, whether the appeal is to be tried on the record, or on the facts that may impeach the record, or on facts that may be added to the record. Both certificates are laid before this high and peculiar council of state, consisting of the two great organized Houses of Congress, and, each having an equal voice, they fail to agree.

Each appellant loses its case, and the voice of the State is silenced. All cases of appeal are lost where the appellate court is equally divided, and men, possibly innocent, have been hanged on the force of that inevitable law.

That the vote of a State should be thus killed would be a misfortune, and its pitying epitaph might be "inter arma leges silent." But in the majority of cases the fault of the State to provide for the preservation of order within its limits would be the real cause of the loss of its electoral power for the time, and it would have no just power to complain of the judges if they could not discern the real lines of justice and right in the tumult of strife between rival parties of factionists or patriots, who may have usurped the powers of the State under the forms of its laws.

Cases of extreme hardship are always arising in all tribunals, but they only serve to modify the rigor of judgment to the degree that is permissible without making shipwreck of principle. Under this bill the cases will be rare in which a State is without fault if it permits two sets of votes of electors to be sent to the President of the Senate in the name of, and under the great seal of, the State. If the States will not dutifully exercise their own powers, so that their rights can not be abridged, they can not justly complain if the two Houses, met to count their votes, are unable to agree as to which of two sets of electors are the rightful representatives of the electoral powers of such States. If the vote is lost in such cases, the fault is wholly with the State.

Twice I have recorded my vote in the Senate in favor of the principles of this measure and once in favor of a concurrent resolution which was based on the same views I have just expressed. On each occasion I have voted with the majority in the Senate, once when the Senate was Democratic and twice when it was Republican, the last time without a division. So this has never been a party question in the Senate since I have been here. I prefer a concurrent resolution, because it is equally as efficacious as a bill, and it is free from the disagreeable fact that the President is to participate in legislation that may directly interfere with a subject of the highest personal interest to him.

No power of legislation can so bind the will or regulate the conduct of "The high council of state and discretion," as my former honored colleague from Alabama (Mr. Pryor) aptly named this electoral body of the first degree, as to make it possible that any other department of the Government can annul or set aside its decree. It may trample under foot every law we enact, and every rule we agree to, and promulgate its decree as the final and conclusive settlement of the question as to who is elected President, and yet its decree will stand. A law will be as a cobweb and a joint rule as a rope of sand as against the power of this tribunal.

No power in this Government can or ever will set aside and annul the declaration of who is elected President of the United States when that declaration is made in the presence of the two Houses of Congress; so that whatever law we may pass, whatever rule we may agree upon, we do no more than to impose upon the consciences of members a sentiment of obedience to law. We can not annex to the law or to the rule any penalty or any sanction by which either can be enforced after the two Houses, met together to count the Presidential vote, have willfully violated and destroyed it and trampled it under foot, and yet have counted the votes and declared the result.

The honorable Senator from Vermont remarked recently in debate that there is a point beyond which you can not bind the human conscience. There is a power in this country existing in most of the tribunals which no one has a right to question or disregard. A decision of the Supreme Court of the United States might be made as a result of bribery, yet there is no power in the country that can set it aside; that is the supreme tribunal. The votes of the Senators in this body might be cast in favor of or against a measure under the direct influence of bribery, but there stands the vote and there is no power that can set it aside because bribery might have influenced Senators in casting it. The vote stands and no power remains to set it aside by searching into the motives of the men who cast it. So this joint tribunal may vote down the voice of the State's electors, or it may sustain one set of certified votes in preference to another, and after the act has been done the power to revoke it, even the power to question it, has passed beyond human control; the only answer is, in such a case, ita lex scripta est.

Why then should we call to our aid the mere moral power of a President's approval of a law which nobody can enforce, when, in doing so, we compromise him, in some sort at least, by asking him to pass judgment on a rule which might make or unmake him as the next President?

I prefer to keep free from Presidential interference, whether it is invited or volunteered, in a matter where the Constitution assigns to him no duty and a proper caution warns him not to intrude. It is a matter where, under the Constitution, no duty is assigned to him, and from which he can abstain, as Mr. Lincoln abstained from acting in a case of the kind, without the slightest danger to the liberties of the country. I agree with Mr. Lincoln in his message to Congress, dated February 8, 1865, on the question of his participation with the Houses in the declaration respecting the electoral votes of Tennessee and Louisiana, which I will read.

As I remember the incident, the two Houses passed a joint resolution and sent it to Mr. Lincoln for his signature before his second election was declared. That resolution expressed the will of Congress that the votes of Tennessee and Louisiana were not entitled to be counted in the electoral vote, and while that had no effect upon the election, it had such a connection with it as that it aroused the sensitiveness of Mr. Lincoln's nature. He did not return the resolution to the House in which it originated until after the votes had actually been counted. The House then adopted the twenty-second rule as a substitute really for that resolution because, I suppose, they had been informed of Mr. Lincoln's intention not to participate in any way in that election, and after the election had been declared he returned the resolution to the Senate with the following message:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the electoral college" has been signed by the Executive in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal; and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if his action were at all essential in the matter. He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting electoral votes; and he also disclaims that by signing said resolution he has expressed any opinion on the recitals of the preamble or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

It is dated February 8, 1865, but it was not sent in until the day after the count took place.

Now that is a worthy example, Mr. President. That message of President Lincoln shows that he was a man who was considerate of his own personal honor and sensitive in respect of any intrusion upon the power and authority of another department of the Government, or any electoral body where the Constitution did not make him expressly a participant in its action.

For that reason, and only for that reason, and because, as I have stated, there can be no sanction given to a rule or to a law which the two Houses cannot trample out at their will and defy, I have always believed that a concurrent resolution between the two Hauses regulating in advance what would be their method of action as questions arose of the kind that are presented in the bill for consideration was the thing that we ought to do. Nevertheless, because others have differed with me in that regard who concur with me in the great point that the two Houses and not the President of the Senate are the bodies who are to regulate and decide questions that arise upon the count of the votes, I yield my opinion upon that matter.

Still, it does seem to me that the President of the United States if he can use the approving power can equally use the veto power, and if we should unfortunately enact a law, for instance the amendment which the honorable Senator from Ohio suggests, and the President should approve it now, and it would turn out that on the last days during the last Congress he has to serve during his incumbency of the office that the different districts in the United States had sent men here who were Democrats in a large majority in the House, say a majority of seventy-five or one hundred, but that when the elections in November came around the people had pronounced against the Democratic party, if you please, by a majority of one hundred in the electoral college, it might be that this very law which the honorable Senator from Ohio wants to put upon the statute-book would enable the House of Representatives with its great majority united with the Senate to defeat the will of the people.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHACE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Alabama and myself have only the same object in view in this matter, and I will ask him a question. Take the case he puts, where the majority of the House is largely against the result of the vote of the electoral college as shown upon the face of the papers, does not the bill as it stands enable the House by a bare majority of one or two or three to reject the vote of a sufficient number of States to nullify the electoral college? Is not that the difficulty? While the proposition I make does not entirely cure it, and I admitted that in the argument, it does bring another element into play, and that is the conservative force of the Senate. I ask the Senator whether the real trouble with the bill is not that a bare majority of the House of Representatives, whose conduct itself might have been the cause of the people revolting and voting against the party which was represented by that majority, might set aside the votes of the people in the electoral college?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly; I do not deny that a corrupt House of Representatives or one strongly under partisan influence, with a large majority, I will say, in favor of the Democrats, could disagree with the Senate upon the question of which of two sets of returns was the proper one from the State of New York. I will put it that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would the Senator like to see that power put in the hands of a majority of either party to defeat the will of the people?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Ohio by his amendment puts it there in the event that the majority of Democrats in the House added, we will say, to the minority of Democrats in the Senate, constitute a majority of the two Houses in the meeting, and in that case, although the President elected, a Republican, might have 100 electoral majority, or something like that, the House by disagreeing in cases of the kind that we have supposed might reverse the entire action of the people in choosing their President and relegate the whole question of the decision as to who was to be President of the United States to men who might have been elected on local issues, such as the cleaning out of the Kiskiminetas or the Cahawba River, or some local question of that kind which belonged to the particular district.

Mr. SHERMAN. What I ask is, does not the bill as it now stands reported from the committee enable either House to do that by a party majority by disagreeing on the count of the electoral vote?

Mr. MORGAN. I have admitted it, and those who framed the Constitution foresaw that such a thing as that might take place, and consequently they put into it a second electoral body or a third electoral body. They put it also in the power of thirteen of the thirty-eight States by simply withdrawing to break the quorum and prevent an election. Now that is guarantee enough. When thirteen out of thirty-eight States, desiring to prevent the consummation of a terrible fraud of the character which is supposed by the Senator from Ohio and which I confess might take place, can prevent it by simply turning their backs on the fraud, as I have observed, and going away from it and breaking the quorum, is not that a great power in reserve?

I do not pretend that the bill covers every evil, but I do say that the bill has in it two principles that are undeniable. The first is that the Houses must be present in their organization to witness and control the opening and count of the votes; and the second is that whatever tribunal acts as a tribunal of control, whether we call it an appellate tribunal or what not—when a tribunal acts as a tribunal of control over other tribunals and it consists of two members, it has always been held that where they could not agree the judgment of the inferior court would stand. Where they can not agree, says the bill, there is no electoral vote because they can not agree. Their disagreement as to which of two electoral votes shall be counted necessarily excludes both lists from the count.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is just what I should like to accomplish, but I do not so understand it. The bill provides that where the two Houses disagree the judgment of the electors shall not stand; that the vote shall not be counted either way to change the result. There is the difficulty.

Mr. MORGAN. That is because there is a tie vote. Let me ask the honorable Senator from Ohio if the same thing would not occur in Illinois in case the House was electing a President, and there were ten Democrats there and ten Republicans—twenty Representatives. What would become of the vote of that State?

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the old law, prior to 1866, the result was that the Senate had often many vacant seats, because of disagreement between the two houses of State Legislatures; and therefore by public opinion it was——

Mr. MORGAN. I am speaking of the electoral vote. I am speaking of when the House is electing a President, and the State of Illinois, having one vote out of thirty-eight, is called, and ten members vote for A and ten vote for B in that House. What becomes of the vote of Illinois?

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is a tie vote in the electoral college the House of Representatives immediately proceeds, under the express provisions of the Constitution, to elect a President.

Mr. INGALLS. No, not a tie vote.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is quite mistaken, there is no election. If there is a tie in a State that gives a candidate less than a majority of all the votes of the States, there is no election.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no election.

Mr. SHERMAN. There would be no election in the case of a tie vote.

Mr. MORGAN. And if there is a tie vote in Illinois, which has twenty Representatives, the vote is not counted. Because the State can not agree, the vote is lost. So when there is a tie vote between the two Houses here in respect of determining which of two votes shall be counted as the vote of Illinois, it is lost. We can not get rid of that difficulty.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The State consents to lose it.

Mr. MORGAN. The State consents to lose it, says the honorable Senator from New Jersey. So when a State fails to provide for the preservation of order within her borders so that she can certify her official acts up to the Congress of the United States, she ought to be put in the category of consenting to be robbed of her electoral power.

This, let it be remarked, is a matter which belongs to and concerns the States of this country, for the States appoint the electors, and if the States, through negligence or through the cowardice or the treachery of their own officials, do not see proper to preserve the electoral vote in such form as that honest men here can ascertain what is the true voice of the State, let it go as it goes in the case of a tie, as I have mentioned in respect of the State of Illinois.

Mr. President, I did not suppose when this bill was before the Senate in the last Congress that any of us would ever be called upon to discuss its merits again, but I found here among gentlemen on this side of the Chamber a degree of uncertainty in their views of the matter that led me to feel that it was my duty, having been heretofore connected officially by the votes of this side of the Chamber with this subject, to express my views upon it in the feeble way that I have done. I appeal to Senators that they will not, in order to get rid of a difficulty which does arise sometimes and will naturally arise, tear down the limitations of the Constitution, and convert the members of the two Houses into a new electoral body to choose a President and take from the Senate its rightful prerogative to command and control the minority of the body wherever that minority may be found, acting in their capacity as Senators.

It can never be necessary to destroy the Houses of Congress as organized bodies by merging their membership into a new and unauthorized body in order to save to the States or the people the honest results of a Presidential election.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MAHONE. With the Senator's permission, I beg to make some reports from a committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio withhold his motion for that purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN. I give way to the Senator from Virginia for the purpose indicated.

ADDITIONAL REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments:

A bill (S. 230) for the erection of a public building at Worcester, Mass.;

A bill (S. 305) for the erection of a public building at Huntsville, Ala.;

A bill (S. 482) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Norfolk, in the State of Virginia;

A bill (S. 453) for the erection of a public building at Jacksonville, Fla.; and

A bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal-revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment:

A bill S. 201) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Annapolis, Md.;

A bill (S. 228) for the erection of a public building at Camden, N. J.; and

A bill (S. 481) authorizing the partition of certain land in Louisville, Ky., belonging jointly to John Echols and the Government of the United States.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 349) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves, reported it with amendments.

REPORT ON COAST DEFENSES.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask leave to make a report at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it, if there be no objection.

Mr. DOLPH. The board appointed by the President, under the provisions of the fortification act passed at the last Congress, to report what fortifications and other defenses were most urgently required, &c., filed a report this morning, which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses. On behalf of that committee I now report by resolution, and ask that the resolution and the report of the board be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution reported from the committee will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 7,000 additional copies of the report of the board of fortifications or other coast defenses be printed; 2,000 for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 each for the War and Navy Departments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

Mr. DOLPH. Together with the report of the board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Together with the report of the board.

ADDITIONAL BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMDEN introduced a bill (S. 1232) granting increase of pension to John S. Hale; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 1233) for the relief of John R. Harrington; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1234) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of George W. Stelts; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1235) granting increase of pension to Joseph W. Rhinehalt; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending bill will be reported by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending which the present occupant of the chair while on the floor moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE RANKIN.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the resolutions from the House of Representatives in regard to the death of Mr. RANKIN be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 25, 1886.

Resolved, That the House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of Hon. JOSEPH RANKIN, late a Representative of the State of Wisconsin.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., as follows:

Almighty and everlasting God, we pray this solemn reminder of our mortality which has come to us in the death of a member of this House may impress every heart and conscience in Thy presence, and move us to give our souls to Him who hath bought us with His own blood, and order our steps in the paths of Thy commandments, that when we pass hence it may be well with us.

We cast upon Thy fatherhood the widow and the orphan children bereaved by this calamity. Cheer them, comfort them, provide for them, O God, and at the end of life's journey bring them to Thy heavenly home with us and with all for whom we should pray. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will yield a moment I will ask unanimous consent that a call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions may be had to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DEATH OF MR. RANKIN, OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, the painful duty devolves upon me to announce to this House the death of my friend and colleague JOSEPH RANKIN, a Representative from the State of Wisconsin, who died on yesterday, at his residence, at 2 o'clock p. m. I shall not detain the House at this time with any remarks upon his memory, but at some future time will ask the consideration of the House. At present I submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of Hon. JOSEPH RANKIN, late a Representative of the State of Wisconsin.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a special joint committee of seven members of the House of Representatives and three members of the Senate be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral and to escort the remains of the deceased to Manitowoc, Wis.; and the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Before declaring the result of the vote the Chair will announce the following as the committee on the part of the House:

Mr. BRAGG of Wisconsin, Mr. VAN SCHAICK of Wisconsin, Mr. STEPHENSON of Wisconsin, Mr. GUENTHER of Wisconsin, Mr. CARLETON of Michigan, Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois, and Mr. JOHNSON of New York.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 26, 1886.

PRAYER.

The Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray. O Thou whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and whose dominion endureth throughout all generations, we come to do Thee homage, and would be enrolled among Thy servants, gladly awaiting Thy commands. We can not thank Thee enough for the mercies of the past. We can only pray that Thou wilt help us to manifest our gratitude by such a conscientious use of our political endowments as shall continue unto us Thy guardianship, and thus insure to us and our posterity honorable place among the nations of the earth.

We are this day to be again reminded of our mortality. The ordinary legislative business shall be put aside while the career of our recently deceased Vice-President is reviewed and the lessons of his eventful life are read for the instruction of the nation. Help us to profit by these memorial services, and may we so number our days as to apply our hearts unto wisdom.

Already our beloved land is the possessor of opportunities which, under the Divine guidance, have developed characters whose history the people are unwilling to forget. We seek to perpetuate their memory by shaft, or sanitarium, or statue; and while we rejoice that these monumental structures grace our parks and crown our hill-sides, we pray the Lord to help us rear above our worthy dead that most honorable and most enduring of all monuments, a Christian civilization. May it be concreted with that justice which is the habitation of Thy throne, that, being structured on the basis which gives stability to Thy eternal kingdom, the Republic may abide.

Hear Thou our prayer; guide us by unerring wisdom while we live; and save us in Thy kingdom when we die. For the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CLAIMS UNDER FRENCH AND SPANISH TREATIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury; which was read and ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 25, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the resolution of the Senate dated the 21st instant, "That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the Senate with a statement showing the character and amount of each of the claims paid under the treaties with France of April 30, 1803, and of July 4, 1831, and under the treaty with Spain of February 22, 1819, together with the names of the claimants," and in reply I have to inform you that the information called for in the resolution was furnished to the honorable Secretary of State on the 20th instant, at great expense to the Government, in compliance with his request of September 10, 1885, and that the Senate may be placed in possession of the desired information with as little delay as possible I would suggest that the resolution be directed to the Department of State.

Respectfully, yours,

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

PAYMENTS TO INTERNAL-REVENUE COLLECTORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1886.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

In obedience to the Senate's resolution of the 14th instant, directing me to furnish certain information respecting the payment of the salaries of "collectors of internal revenue not confirmed by the Senate," I have the honor to reply that since March 1, 1879, payments of salary have been made to ninety-five "collectors of internal revenue not confirmed by the Senate;" and that seventy of the ninety-five to whom such payments were made had, at the time of said payments, been designated to perform the duties of other collectors suspended by the President during a recess of the Senate, under the authority conferred by section 1768 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Some of the payments made to persons so designated were made prior to March 4, 1885, and some of them were made since that date.

Inclosed I send a report upon this subject this day received from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and two tabulated statements which accompanied it.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

DEATH OF VICE-PRESIDENT HENDRICKS.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, pursuant to notice heretofore given, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolutions now pending before this body touching the death of the late Vice-President of the United States, and I ask for their reading in that connection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolutions mentioned by him. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. VOORHEES on the 7th of December, 1885:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States, and for a number of years a distinguished member of this body.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be suspended in order that the eminent public services and the private virtues of the deceased may be appropriately commemorated.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions are now before the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, for the eminent citizen of the Republic who lately fell from his high place among living men, and who sleeps now in peace and honor in the bosom of the State he loved and served, we can do no more than has already been done by tongue and pen, and by every method which human affection can inspire. The heavy drapery of woe has darkened alike the public building, the stately mansion, and the doorway of the humble home; the proud colors of the Union have drooped at half-mast throughout the United States and in all civilized lands beneath the sun; eloquence in the forum and at the sacred desk has paid its richest tributes to his exalted abilities and to his stainless character; the tolling bell, the mournful dirge, the booming solemn minute-gun, the mighty multitude of mourners, have all attended the funeral of Thomas A. Hendricks, and borne witness to the deep love and grief with which he was lowered into his last earthly abode. All the honors due to the most illustrious dead have been paid by the Chief Magistrate of the Government, by the authority of States, and by the unrestrained affection of the people.

In the Senate, however, we may not be silent even though the cup of honor to his memory is full and overflowing. In this exalted theater of action, here on this brilliantly lighted stage, he fulfilled his last official engagement and closed his long and commanding public career. When this body adjourned in April last he went out from these walls to return to them no more forever. The chair to which he had been called by the American people was vacant when Senators gathered here again, and now we briefly halt in our weary march to do honor to ourselves, and to benefit the living, by pointing out the attractive virtues of the dead.

Thomas A. Hendricks was a native of the Mississippi Valley, born in Muskingum County, Ohio, on the 7th day of September, 1819. He had the good fortune to be born on a farm, so often the nursery of mental and physical development and power. His earliest associations were with people who earned their bread by the honest labor of their own hands, and the impressions thus made on his mind were with him always. They inspired his sympathies, and to a great extent governed his ideas of public duty at every stage of his long official life.

Early in the spring of 1820, when the late Vice-President was six months old, his father, Maj. John Hendricks, with his young family, moved to the State of Indiana, then indeed an infant State, but three years older than the strong man-child then in his mother's arms, and destined to control the gravest affairs of the Commonwealth and to wear her highest civic laurels. After a brief sojourn at Madison, the well-known historic residence in the interior of the State at Shelbyville, Shelby County, was assumed by Major Hendricks, and maintained with dignity, hospitality, and great practical usefulness until he slept with his fathers.

In the heart of the dense forest, upon the gentle eminence overlooking the beautiful valley, he built the sightly and commodious brick house which yet stands in good preservation in open view of the thriving city and richly cultivated country around. It soon became known as a center of learning and social delight, and was the favorite resort of men of distinction and worth. It was in particular the seat of hospitality to the orthodox ministry, Mr. Hendricks being the principal founder and support of the Presbyterian church in that community. The presiding genius of that home was the gentle wife and mother, who tempered the atmosphere of learning and zeal with the sweet influences of charity and love. Essentially clever and persistent, she was possessed of a rare quality of patience, which stood her in better stead than a more aggressive spirit.

It was at such a home as this, on one of the outer lines of advancing civilization, shedding its rays of beneficent Christian light over the waste places and lighting up the wilderness, that the future lawyer and statesman began his growth in knowledge, grace, and power, and rose to the full stature of his splendid manhood.

What a swift unfolding panoramic view of the march of empire and of human progress was given him to behold in his own lifetime of less than three score years and ten! Indiana was admitted into the Union only sixty-nine years ago with but thirteen organized counties, 12,112 voters, and a total population of 63,897. The first impressions of men and things made on the mind of Governor Hendricks in his childhood outside of his own home were of a sparsely settled country, neighborhoods composed of a few families, making here and there an opening in the wilderness, and separated from each other by long miles of towering unbroken forests. He was made familiar with accounts of pioneer privation, self-sacrifice, and heroism. Indians were still abundant in Indiana, and though not on the warpath, were uncomfortable neighbors, and he sometimes listened to the hunter with buckskin shirt and unerring rifle who had fought the red man at Fort Harrison, Tippecanoe, the River Raisin, and the Thames but a few years before. He knew at one time what it was to go six miles from home for the privileges of a very ordinary and uncertain school. The highway of his early youth was the trail through the woods, from one settlement to another, surveyed and laid out not with rod and chain, but with the ax of the frontierman blazing the trees to give the traveler or the lost wanderer his points of compass and his way onward. His memory dwelt on the mill by the flowing stream, where, with primitive methods, the bread of the pioneer and those beneath his generous roof was provided for.

In after years, when all these things had passed away like a dream, and when he was decorated with almost every official distinction, he would on rare occasions charm his listeners with pleasing pictures which had been indelibly painted on his youthful mind. I vividly recall one such instance only a little more than seven years ago. The Millers' National Association met at Indianapolis in May, 1878, and Governor Hendricks was chosen to welcome them to a public dinner. In the course of his remarks, and after dwelling upon the association before him as one of the most potent factors in the world in providing an increased amount and an improved quality of food, his mind reverted to the scenes of his boyhood, and with the touch of a master and to the delight of his audience of advanced millers, he produced from memory the following gem of portrait painting:

As a boy I was acquainted with the miller, and I thought him a great man. When he raised the gate with such composure and confidence, and the tumbling waters drove the machinery ahead, I admired his power. And then he talked strongly upon all questions. He was very positive upon politics, religion, law, and mechanics. Any one bold enough to dispute a point was very likely to have a personal argument thrown in his face, for he knew all the gossip among his customers. He was cheerful. I thought it was because he was always in the music of the running waters and the whirling wheels. He was kind and clever, indeed so much so that he would promise the grists before they could be ready, and so the boys had to go two or three times. He was a chancellor and prescribed the law, every one in his turn. That miller, standing in the door of his mill, all white with dust, is a picture even upon the memory of this generation. It is the picture of a manly figure. I wonder if you gentlemen, the lords of many runs and bolts, are ashamed to own him as your predecessor. It was a small mill, sometimes upon a willowy brook and sometimes upon a larger stream, but it stood upon the advance line of the settlements. With its one wheel to grind Indian corn, and one for wheat, and in the fall and winter season one day in the week set apart for grinding buckwheat, it did the work for the neighborhood.

Plain and unpretentious as compared with your stately structures, yet I would not say it contributed less toward the development of the country and the permanent establishment of society. So great a favorite was it, and so important to the public welfare, that the authorities in that day invoked in its favor the highest power of the State, that of eminent domain. That mill and miller had to go before you and yours, and I am happy to revive the memory of the miller at the custom mill, who with equal care adjusted the sack upon the horse for the boy to ride on, and his logic in support of his theory in politics or his dogma in religion.

But while Governor Hendricks would thus at times recall the early days of Indiana and her small beginnings, on the other hand his joy and pride, everywhere and under all circumstances, at her unparalleled progress in every channel of thought and action were boundless and unrestrained. His enthusiasm over the development, strength, resources, cultivation, and honor of the State whose infancy he had shared and to whose greatness he had contributed was of a character not to be fully understood nor appreciated except by those to whom the nature and attributes of his mind were revealed by long and intimate association. Indiana was the one theme, whether in public or private speech, on which his voice would fill with emotion and his eyes flash with unwonted fires or grow moist with affection and gratified pride. He saw her meager population swell to over two millions, her primitive highways give place to more than six thousand miles of railroad, her farms teeming with more wheat and corn than any other State of equal size, her coal beds and manufactories filling the world with their productions and their fame; he saw accumulated the largest school fund per capita of any commonwealth on the globe, and he exulted in the free schools, the high schools, the normal schools, the seminaries, the colleges, and the universities which adorn and illuminate the State.

We have heard and read much in our day and generation on the subject of State pride and the duty a citizen owes to his State government. Governor Hendricks loved the American Union, and gave it his warm, unstinted, and unwavering allegiance, and held that no duty to his State could interfere with his duty to the Federal Government. And yet his love for Indiana, and his pride in her position before the world, was never less ardent and sincere than that of the most devoted disciple of that school of State rights which existed before the war, but which exists now no more. The people of Indiana well understood this fact, and repaid his affection with their own faithful attachment.

But Governor Hendricks had another and earlier reason for his devotion to the State besides his own connection with her affairs. It will be seen from the records of the Territory and of the State that no other name has had so long, so permanent, and so conspicuous a place in the history of Indiana as that of his family. When the delegate convention met at Corydon on the 10th of June, 1816, under the authority of the enabling act of Congress, to frame a constitution for the new State, William Hendricks was the secretary of that small but able and historic body. He was an elder brother of Maj. John Hendricks, and consequently an uncle of the late Vice-President. He was large and commanding in person, with marked intellectual ability. In August, 1816, he was elected a member of Congress under the new constitution, and thus became the first Representative of the State of Indiana at the Federal capital. In this position he won such distinction that in 1822 he was elected governor of the new Commonwealth.

There is nothing more trying to a young man's reputation and to his future success than to be charged with the duties of a frontier State, with all its bitter necessities; its just expectations, so long deferred as to make the heart sick; its oppressive burdens, which might be lightened by promptitude and justice on the part of the Federal Government; its keen and constant struggles for full recognition as a member of the Union with equal rights and dignity in the company of its sister States. This ordeal was passed, however, so successfully, that in 1825 William Hendricks was elected a Senator in Congress from Indiana and re-elected for a second term, giving him twelve years of service in the Senate of the United States at a most important period in the history of the State and nation. A fertile and wealthy county in the central portion of Indiana bears his honored name and stands as an enduring monument to the memory of an able and faithful public servant. In 1837 his public life closed, and it was but eleven years later when another official career began which was destined to be longer and more brilliant and to render the same name still more illustrious. Thomas A. Hendricks came upon the theater of professional and public life better equipped for the duties before him than young men generally were at that early period in the West. While his youth had been surrounded by the privations of the frontier, he experienced but few of them in his own person.

His father was a prosperous man for his day, and, with the commendable family pride of an intelligent, well-read gentleman, he spared no pains or expense in preparing his sons, as far as existing opportunities then permitted, to enter with credit and success upon the duties of manhood. In the village and neighborhood schools, and at South Hanover College, Abram, the eldest son, pursued his studies to become a Presbyterian minister, and his brother, next younger, laid the foundations of his future greatness in the councils of men. Governor Hendricks was a lover of books, and from his youth up his mind was fashioned to industry, study, and research. In making choice of a profession he followed his earliest inclinations and eagerly embraced the law. When a mere boy he loved the court-room, and listened with intense interest and delight to the mental conflicts of strong men. Upon his return from college he entered at once on his legal studies in the office of Judge Major, at Shelbyville. He subsequently went to Chambersburg, Pa., and further pursued his studies under the tuition of his kinsman, Judge Thomson. When he was admitted to the bar on his return home he had a student's well-trained mind, and a knowledge of the great principles of the common law, which increased and expanded with his advancing years, and on which he never relied in vain in the conflicts of after life.

The opening years of his professional career were not marked by sensational success, but rather by a steady growth in the confidence of the courts and of the people as a diligent, capable, and rising man. In the meager practice of the village lawyer great amounts were not at stake, but in the preparation and trial of small cases the principles of the law laid down by Blackstone, Chitty, and other great masters of jurisprudence were often more clearly and ably presented than in controversies in the highest courts involving millions.

To one imbued with zeal and ambition for legal eminence no trial in court is unimportant when it presents an issue of law or of equity. In this spirit and with this conception of his profession Governor Hendricks pursued his labors from the beginning. In 1848 he was elected to the Legislature; and at that point began that long double line of duties, one in the courts and one in the political arena, lasting thirty-seven years, and only closing when his active but weary brain ceased to throb. He became an eminent leader on both lines of action, and so evenly and well-balanced were his powers that it would be difficult to decide on which he was most conspicuous and commanding. To his own mind and heart, as his intimate friends well know, his labors and his triumphs in the courts were the dearest and most satisfactory. The keen, high zest with which he often enjoyed the conflicts of the bar and their results was something, when once witnessed, not readily forgotten. If the law, as the old writers have it, is indeed a jealous mistress, yet she had no cause to complain of his want of love or devotion, or of his absence from her chambers, except when driven to other fields of duty by the highest order that can be issued to a citizen in State or nation. He lived to realize that his fidelity to his profession had met its just reward.

The history of Indiana is luminous with the names of able lawyers and profound jurists from the days of Isaac Blackford down to the present time, and among the brightest and the strongest of that great galaxy the name of Thomas A. Hendricks long since took its permanent place. If to some this may seem merely the voice of personal friendship, perhaps insensible to careful discrimination and close analysis, I would recall to them the imposing meeting of his brothers in the law, held at Indianapolis, and gathered from every part of the State by the dread summons of his death. Into that Federal court-room, where he had won and worn many of his brightest laurels, there came on that sad day the oldest, the ablest, and the most learned of the Indiana bar. Within its hallowed precincts every thought and recollection of political warfare died away, every memory of party strife was hushed, and men of every creed and faith pressed forward to bear testimony in eloquent and burning words to their admiration for the great lawyer, then cold and motionless forever. Judge Gresham, now of the United States circuit court, and so long and honorably connected with the Federal judiciary and recently with the administration of the General Government, on assuming the chair by the call of the meeting said:

We are assembled to pay our tribute of respect to an eminent member of our profession. Although Mr. Hendricks occupied many high stations in the State and nation, finally the second highest in the gift of the people, all of which he filled with distinguished ability, he never lost his fondness for his chosen profession. His triumphs at the bar were, perhaps, fully as satisfactory as his triumphs in the conflicts of politics. * * * In capacity for rapid absorption of a case, arrangement of facts in their proper relation, and in the application of principles to facts, Mr. Hendricks greatly excelled. While he justly stood in the front rank of the profession, perhaps his real sphere was that of the advocate. In this line he had no superiors, perhaps no equals. As a trial lawyer he was self-reliant and courageous, and when a case took a sudden and unexpected turn, and defeat seemed almost inevitable, he exhibited rare skill and great reserve power. It was on such occasions that he appeared to the best advantage.

In the memorial prepared and presented by the bar committee is the following:

Mr. Hendricks was throughout the whole period of his active life a lawyer, even in his last days concerned in the conduct of causes. His entrance upon and employments in public life were episodes, excursions, useful to himself and others, but did not divert him from the beaten path of forensic labor. On the floor of the Senate, in the halls of legislation, he sojourned—at the bar, in the courts, he dwelt. He was engaged in very much of the important litigation at the capital of his State. His practice was by no means local. He attended in the discharge of professional duties nearly every circuit in our own and many of the higher courts of adjoining States and the Supreme Court at Washington.

The chairman of that committee, David Turpie, once a distinguished member of this body, drew the following eloquent analysis of the late Vice-President as a lawyer, all of which might with equal fidelity to truth be said of himself:

His legal abilities were so various and diversified that it is difficult to say in what branch of the profession he most excelled; still harder to determine in what, if any, he was deficient.

As a pleader, that is, in making the statement of a claim or defense upon paper, he was careful, diligent, exact. * * *

He gave great attention to the preparation of litigated causes for trial. * *

Rightly deeming that proof, like glass, should be handled with care, and might be much affected by the manner of its utterance and the time of its introduction, his verb "prepare" had a mood, a tense in it often overlooked by others.

He had the capacity to grasp a case, and, having grasped, to hold it in all its details; before development, from the oath in chief of the jury to their retirement. He seemed, so to speak, to stand seized of it, per mi et per tout, in entireties; so that if it failed upon one hypothesis, it should yet survive and succeed upon another.

Called upon to name in briefest phrase the most prominent trait in his mental character, aside from those splendid qualities which attracted public notice, I should say it was his power of discernment.

* * * He saw the relation in which one thing stands to another, their corelative bearings, what these relations would be or might become at any stage, mesne or final, of the proceedings.

And this did not seem to be so much an acquirement or an accomplishment as a faculty, a faculty of introspection, of prevision, a sort of subsidiary sense or sensibility.

In this he was exceptionally great. It was a quiet power—calm, tranquil, noiseless in its operation, but strange as wisdom, certain as inspiration, and in its effects unavoidable as the decree of fate itself.

His powers of analysis were large, yet fully equaled by those of combination and construction. His mind in this respect had a dual capacity seldom found in the same person.

Joseph E. McDonald, so well known and so honored here, held the following language:

The national flag at half-mast, a city draped in mourning, and the many sad faces that throng our streets, all attest the fact that one who had enshrined himself in the hearts of the people of this State and had inscribed his name high up in the roll of the distinguished men of our country had closed his earthly career; and while we, his brothers of the bar, have met to pay to his memory that honor to which it is entitled, on account of the high rank he held in our profession, a nation bows its head in sorrow. Monuments may be erected to perpetuate his name, but none will be more enduring than the memorial you will this day enroll upon the records of the courts. It is the lawyers' monument, and will remain when monuments of brass or stone have crumbled, and fallen, and mingled with the dust. The memorial and resolutions you are about to adopt speak of him, his character and career, and render it unnecessary for me to more than briefly allude to them.

Others in glowing periods and with stately phrase paid tribute to their departed forensic leader, each one contributing to the establishment of "the lawyers' monument" in the judicial records of the country, "which will remain when monuments of brass or stone have crumbled, and fallen, and mingled with the dust."

Turning our attention at this point from his legal to his political line of duties, we find a circumstance at the start which may be taken as the key to his whole career. In 1850 Indiana had outgrown the methods and the apparel of her childhood, and stood in need of certain fundamental changes in her organic law, better adapted to her stalwart and rapidly developing proportions. The Legislature authorized a constitutional convention to be called. To frame the constitution of a State has always been esteemed the proper work of the fathers and the elders, of those ripe in years and full of experience. Here and there exceptions have been wisely made to this general rule, and the people of Shelby County made such an exception in the choice of their delegate. Governor Hendricks had put his foot on the first round in the ladder of his political life when he went to the Legislature in 1848, and now he was called to go higher.

Thus it was at every step of his remarkable history. He inspired such confidence in every position he held that he not only never lost an inch of ground once attained, but the constant and confident demand of those who knew him best throughout his entire career was for his promotion from height to height as long as there was a position of honor and duty above him. He rose with steady, unfaltering steps, and never disappointed the expectations of those who gave him their faith. It mattered not in what situation he was placed, he met its requirements with ability, with dignity, with courage, and with clean-hearted and clean-handed integrity. In this one great fact, shining out like a star over the pathway of his life, his friends and followers had their abundant pride and joy.

In the constitutional convention, though but thirty-one years of age, he so bore himself in company, and sometimes in contact, with the oldest and ablest leaders of both political parties then in the State that in the following year, 1851, he received his indorsement and promotion by being elected to Congress. This was followed by a re-election, and then by defeat at the polls in 1854, that weird, anomalous year in American politics. Within a few months, however, after his return home to his law office he was, without solicitation and very unexpectedly, appointed Commissioner of the General Land Office by President Pierce. His conduct in the House and the discharge of his duties there had marked him as an able, safe, industrious, and honest public official. The General Land Office was then, as it is now, all things considered, the most important bureau in the Government.

The interest of the American people in the public lands reaches all classes, and the cupidity of land speculators and the plundering instincts of timber pirates were tempted thirty years ago in the same way and almost to the same degree as at the present juncture. Governor Hendricks was slow to accept the position, and only did so after careful consultation with friends, and especially with his father, on whose judgment he greatly relied. His administration of the office proved the wisdom of the selection, and he continued to hold it under Mr. Buchanan until 1859, when he resigned, returned to Indiana, and once more resumed his profession at Shelbyville. He had but little respite. In 1860, in the very shadow of the thick-coming events so soon to follow, he obeyed the call of his party in convention, and ran a failing race for governor of the State, weighted down from the start by the ominous collision between Douglas and Breckinridge. A high promotion, however, awaited him soon.

The Legislature of Indiana chosen in 1862 elected him a Senator in Congress, and he took his seat as such on the 4th of March, 1863. Here, in this the most exalted legislative body in the world or in the history of the world, he gave himself up for six years, with absolute devotion, to public duty, and established that strong and enduring national reputation which ever afterwards attended him. For vigilant attention to the business of the Senate, for a knowledge of its principles and its details, and for earnest candid labor in its transaction, both in committee and in discussion on this floor, it is doubtful whether any Senator ever surpassed him. The pages of the Congressional Globe from day to day attest this fact and are rich with treasures of his thought and eloquence. He was the ever-present leader of a small minority in this body, and never relaxed his hold upon the laboring oar.

While the war lasted he favored its earnest prosecution, and voted for all supplies to sustain the Army. When the war closed he held that the States whose people had been in rebellion had never been out of the Union, and were consequently entitled to representation in both branches of Congress and to the control of their respective State governments. He antagonized the doctrine of reconstruction, maintaining that Congress had no power to reconstruct the governments of States which had never ceased to be members of the American Union. I recall his position on this great subject not for the purpose of reviving even a debatable thought in the minds of Senators, but to convey some idea of the character and magnitude of his labors while a member of this body.

In the debates which ensued every principle vital to the structure and existence of the Government of the United States as a Republic was involved and its value tested by argument. Every day, and at times almost every hour, witnessed keen and strong encounters between such leaders as Fessenden, Grimes, Sumner, and Trumbull on the one hand, and Hendricks on the other. He won the respect and esteem of his opponents here as he did elsewhere. He looked back on his service in the Senate with pleasure, but with no desire to again enter this Chamber as a member. He often said he had done a faithful work, which would never be needed again, to restore a helpless and broken people to peace and safety and self-control under the Constitution, and that he was willing the book of his labors in the Senate should be considered finished, and remain as he left it on the 4th of March, 1869.

In the midst of his heavy labors, and the severe mental strain upon him as a Senator, surrounded by such peculiar circumstances, another burden of the first magnitude was imposed upon his shoulders. In 1868 his party demanded him again as a candidate for Governor, and while he yielded with reluctance and with a full appreciation of the odds at that time against him, yet he entered upon the memorable campaign and conducted it to the close with an ability, courteous bearing, and perfect courage never to be forgotten in the history of Indiana. General Grant carried the State by nearly 10,000 majority, while it will never be absolutely certain whether Governor Hendricks or Governor Baker, his competitor, received the most votes. The count at last decided in favor of Baker by about 1,100 majority.

From March, 1869, when his duties terminated in the Senate, until the summer of 1872, Governor Hendricks diligently and with great enjoyment to himself practiced his profession, being the head of the well-known firm of Hendricks, Hord & Hendricks, at Indianapolis. But the tenacious devotion of his party was not willing to leave the close and unsatisfactory result of 1868 without another appeal to the people on the same issue.

His resistance to the appeals of a unanimous convention for him to run again for governor in 1872 was extreme, and for a long time unyielding. When at last borne down by a sense of duty to a great and devoted party he yielded up his own desires and took the race, he wore a look of patient fortitude and heroic self-sacrifice, well remembered by those who saw him on that occasion. In that year of Democratic defeat and disaster, more or less deserved, when Grant beat Greeley in Indiana over 22,000, Hendricks was elected governor by about 1,200 majority, all the remainder of the Democratic State ticket being defeated except the candidate for superintendent of public instruction.

From January, 1873, to January, 1877, a period of four years, he made a record as governor of Indiana full of honor, usefulness to the people, dignity, grace, and refinement. It is without blemish, stain, or fault. There is nothing he could have wished to change, amend, or recall; nothing for his most ardent friends to deplore or to cause them to blush or apologize. The people of Indiana know him but little, if at all, by any other title than that of their governor, for in that capacity he was in their midst, and in personal contact with them more than in any other. They knew him best, and it followed that they loved him most, as Governor Hendricks.

But in what rapid succession public honors sought him at every stage of his life! While yet governor of Indiana, in 1876, he was nominated at Saint Louis for the Vice-Presidency, and I am sure I will not offend the most delicate susceptibility by saying that, as in his contest for governor in 1868 so in that of 1876, it will always be a matter of honest doubt in many minds whether he was defeated by 1 vote or elected by a considerable majority. When in 1884 he was in fact elected Vice-President, but by a very slender majority, it did indeed seem as if the very genius of close contests and narrow margins in the ballot had presided over his political fortunes, but that at last the account was invariably settled in his favor. His victories were the results of hard-fought and doubtful battles, and his defeats the same.

Governor Hendricks has been charged with inordinate ambition. It is true that he was ambitious for an honorable fame, but for place and position he cared far less in his own behalf than his friends did for him. They believed him fit to be President, and they followed his fortunes as his Scotch ancestors followed the Bruce, whatever fate awaited them. That he would have made a wise, prudent, and able administration of the Government as its Chief Magistrate will not be questioned by those most familiar with his public services and private worth.

In the spirit of accusation and reproach it has been charged, and more especially in these later days, that he was a partisan in his political ideas and methods. If by this is meant that he sincerely believed in the principles and purposes of the party to which he belonged, and sought by all honorable methods to promote what he conceived to be the public good by placing its measures and its men in control of the Government, then the accusation is true, and the term intended as a reproach becomes simply a just tribute to an honest man. If, however, it is intended to convey the impression that he was ever during all the years of his political life violent, factious, unreasonable, or proscriptive toward his opponents, whoever or whatever they might be, nothing could possibly be more erroneous.

There were no neutral tints in his own political colors, but his tolerance for opposing opinions was so gentle, his manner of meeting them in discussion so free from bitterness, so sparing of assault, and so full of respect for their candor that prejudice melted away in his presence and left his hearers with unbiased minds to weigh his clear and forcible arguments. It has been the partisan with deep, honest convictions, dealing justly with opposing views, who, in all ages of the world and in every field of human progress, has led the way. Wherever the lists of free controversy have been opened, wherever conflicts of opinion have determined the thought and action of mankind, there the well-equipped partisan, his zeal tempered with respect and magnanimity toward his adversaries, has been a guiding power, and has engraved his name in letters more durable than brass or marble on the tablets of history. To this rank of partisanship may be properly assigned the honored name of him whose death we mourn.

Much has been said and written, and often without wisdom or point, on the subject of leadership among men. No man was ever a leader of his fellow-men in a free country by self-assertion or the spirit of dictation. He who controls the reason, convinces the judgment, enlightens and satisfies the conscience, is a leader of the people mightier far than he who relies on the sword. Strong argument, elaborate research, and eloquent persuasion have been, and will ever continue to be, more potent factors in the world's long annals than the gleaming bayonet and the shotted cannon. By their peaceful but powerful instrumentalities Governor Hendricks won his way to a high and very commanding political leadership.

In his repeated, long-sustained, and severe contests in Indiana he always led his followers with consummate judgment, perfect courage, and a brilliant display of intellectual force. Sometimes on the eve of a political battle he paused and weighed the issues at stake with such care and prudence, that those who knew but little of the quality of his mind thought he hesitated to go to the front. Nothing could be more incorrect than such a conclusion. While others were at times more aggressive, and more rapid in their decisions at the beginning, yet none led more boldly, nor further in advance, when the conflict became fiercest, and when it closed in victory or in defeat.

Governor Hendricks was never so strong, so magnetic, and so irresistible as when under assault or crowded in discussion by an able antagonist. In joint debate before the people from day to day, and from week to week, he has had no superior, and rarely an equal in the history of the country. His qualities for such an ordeal were of the highest order. A self-possession never for a moment disturbed, a mental concentration no excitement could shake, a memory of facts never losing its grasp, a will which never faltered, and a courage which rose in the presence of danger as certainly as the mercury in the tube under heat, were all his. Added to these gifts and acquirements was a voice, rich, musical, and resonant, pealing forth at his pleasure like a bugle call to action, or modulated into the soft, seductive notes of the flute, wooing the affections. A high-bred, classic face of singular manly beauty, lit up by a winning and genial expression, a large head with the contour and poise of an antique model, completed a picture which was never beheld by an audience without emotions of delight.

Five years ago the unremitting labors and the incessant strain of more than the third of a century caused the powerful and compact physical constitution of Governor Hendricks to put forth its first signals of distress, and to reel for a time like a disabled ship in the breakers. In the autumn of 1880, seeking for rest and surcease of toil, he visited that famous cañon of the Ozark Mountains, in Arkansas, where magical springs pour forth their hot and healing waters. While there in repose, and apparent security, the icy finger of paralysis, sure precursor of skeleton death, touched him with its fatal premonition.

The extent of his danger at that time was never known, except to her whose life was as his own, and to his physicians, who did not conceive it their duty to publish their patient's ailments in the newspapers. He came home, however, to his beloved State, and again took up his public and private duties with serenity and composure, but he knew from that time forward that he walked in the constant shadow of an impending blow. Not a word ever escaped him on the subject outside of his domestic circle. No wail, nor murmur, nor lament ever shook his lofty fortitude or passed his lips. When two years later he was stricken with lameness in his foot, and informed that he could rise no more to take part in the affairs of life, he was the only party to the scene unmoved by the great change then apparently so near. He spoke of his work as finished, and quietly waited for the curtains which divide time from eternity to be drawn aside. But medical opinion had erred, and it was reserved for him to receive one more promotion at the hands of his countrymen, to be crowned with another and higher honor, and to fall at last, when his hour did come, within a single step of the summit of human greatness.

At the Chicago convention in 1884 Governor Hendricks made the only appearance of his life in such a body. The old familiar light was in his face, and his mental vision was as clear and penetrating as ever, but he was physically not strong, and the prompt, alert movement and elastic tread which his friends knew so well were wanting. His presence in that convention was contagious, and the vast multitude shouted themselves hoarse and shook the mighty amphitheater with his name whenever he appeared, but no exultation came for a moment into his look or manner. To those near him he simply appeared to enjoy in a quiet silent way the popular approval of his long and faithful services, under the weight of which he was then wearily walking in the rich and glowing sunset of a great and well-spent life. When he was nominated for Vice-President he was seeking repose and sleep on his bed at the hotel at the close of an exciting day. He did not hear the tender words and strains of Auld Lang Syne break forth from ten thousand voices at the mention of his name, exclaiming:

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to mind?

The effect of the nomination on Governor Hendricks himself was immediate and remarkable. The position of Vice-President was one to which he had never aspired, nor were its duties congenial to his talents or tastes. He knew and accepted the fact that a dread specter was hovering near him and liable to cast its fatal dart at any moment, and more especially in the midst of labor and excitement. He had so often, however, led his party, and had always so fully met the expectations of his devoted friends in Indiana, that his iron will at once determined not to disappoint them on the last field where he was to appear. His resolution seemed to summon up all the vigor of the best years of his manhood.

The energy and activity he displayed were never surpassed in a political contest. He declared himself ready to answer for his State, as he did in 1876, and the response of the people justified his promise and his claim. The brilliant and gifted leader of the Republican party, known in the list of the political tournament as the Plumed Knight, crossed the borders of Indiana, was welcomed with all the pomp and circumstance of a great party long accustomed to national victories, made a tour of the State with his banner full high advanced, inspiring the confidence and kindling into a flame the zeal and devotion of those who believed in his destiny and followed his star. As Mr. Blaine closed his engagements in Indiana and drew off to other fields, it was determined that his dramatic and dazzling expedition into the West should have its bold and effective counterpart.

Governor Hendricks, upon brief announcement, passed rapidly from point to point, and the people rose up to do him honor until the whole State seemed one vast continuous assemblage. It was his farewell engagement on the hustings, and he filled it like a master. Such an ovation was rarely ever given to hero or statesman in ancient or modern times, and the children of this generation will recall its scenes when they are old men and women in the distant future.

But while he moved in the midst of these pageants, honors, and allurements, it was known to a chosen and silent few that his mind and heart dwelt apart from them, and were engaged with matters of higher import than those of earth. During the last two years of his life he selected and prepared the beautiful spot where he now reposes. He gave his close personal attention to the finish and erection of the stately marble shaft which bears his name and marks his final abode. His only child died when but three years old, and for more than thirty years had rested at the old home at Shelbyville.

As he felt the evening shadows coming on, the strong man, the able lawyer, the distinguished Senator, and governor, and Vice-President, wished his long lost little boy to sleep by his side. He tenderly transferred the sacred dust from Shelbyville, and when he himself was by loving hands laid to rest, the grave of a child was observed close by covered with flowers. At times he visited this hallowed spot and lingered there while his own name was ringing with applause or provoking fierce controversy. His thoughts were then far away, and with deep emotion he gathered up the broken links of the past, and by a faith that never faltered nor grew dim, reunited them in that high world beyond the sun and beyond the stars.

Governor Hendricks was a believing and practical Christian all the days of his life. His duties to the church were no more neglected nor evaded than his duties to the state. He held official relations with both, but never mingled them. He bore open and public testimony on all proper occasions to his reliance upon the teachings of Christianity for the advancement of civilization and for the happiness of mankind. In his private life he exemplified the beautiful virtues of his religion. He was much given to charity, not merely in the bestowal of alms to the poor, but in the kindness of his heart and the tolerance of his spirit toward all. He obeyed the apostolic injunction, and lived in peace with all men as far as it lay in his power to do so. He never gave the first blow in a personal controversy, and often forbore to return those he received. He loved his neighbors, and was by them beloved.

Sir, we shall see Thomas A. Hendricks no more with our mortal eyes. He is gone from the high places of earth to the higher realms of immortality. He is lost to the Senate Chamber, to the forum, and to home and friends. We will follow him; he will return no more to us. As long, however, as American history treasures up pure lives and faithful public services; as long as public and private virtue, stainless and without blemish, is revered, so long will his name be cherished by the American people as an example worthy the highest emulation. Monuments of brass and marble will lift their heads toward heaven in honor of his fame, but a monument more precious to his memory and more valuable to the world has already been founded in the hearts of the people whom he served so long, so faithfully, and with such signal ability. In the busy harvest time of death, in the year 1885, there was gathered into eternity no nobler spirit, no higher intelligence, no fairer soul.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, when death laid his inexorable hand on Thomas A. Hendricks, Vice-President of the United States, we had a striking and painful illustration of the truth that "death loves a shining mark, a signal blow." Eminent alike for his abilities and his virtues; honored wherever known and loved best where best known; crowned with almost every civic honor which a grateful people could bestow; occupying one of the most exalted positions in our country, and blessed by a domestic happiness perfect as it was beautiful, he did indeed offer a shining mark to the insatiate archer.

One of the great Roman satirists tells us that "pale death with impartial footsteps knocks alike at the poor man's hut and the palace of kings," and every page of history teaches the mournful truth that "the paths of glory lead but to the grave." How often in the last few months has this solemn lesson been brought home to our hearts! The last days of summer saw a countless multitude with bowed and uncovered heads line the road over which the soldier President of this great Republic was borne to his last resting place, and the echoes of the funeral march that sounded his dirge had scarcely died away when the body of that other great soldier, General McClellan, was committed to its mother earth.

Again is the country called on to mourn the death of another illustrious citizen, and the Senate of the United States, of which he had been a distinguished and honored member, over which as his last public duty he presided with dignity and impartiality, pauses amid the routine of its daily duties to pay a tribute to the memory of its late presiding officer, and to give utterance to the sorrow which fills every patriotic heart in our country for the death of our honored Vice-President. It is eminently fit and proper that this should be done, and my only regret in joining in this tribute is that my contribution to it must necessarily be so unworthy of him to whose memory it is offered. It would be difficult for me under the most favorable conditions to say anything worthy of this theme, and the task has been rendered impossible since we have listened to the eloquent words just uttered by the Senator from Indiana. I can not venture even to glean in the field reaped so thoroughly by him, and I must content myself by expressing in a few sincere, heartfelt words the respect, the esteem, and the admiration felt by our people for Mr. Hendricks while living and the profound grief caused by his untimely death. These feelings, I am sure, are not confined to one section or to one party, but are shared by all classes, wherever honor, integrity, virtue, and piety such as marked the character of the illustrious dead are respected and venerated. As a proof of the truth of this, Mr. President, we need no stronger evidence than the scene which now meets our view in this Chamber, when members of both parties vie with each other in heartfelt expressions of esteem for the stainless character, public and private, of Mr. Hendricks. While this testimonial is honorable to those who offer it and deserved by him to whom it is given, it seems to me that we can draw from it a lesson profitable to us all if we heed it. It should teach us to be charitable in our judgment of those who differ with us. Fortunately in this case we need not invoke charity in the judgment pronounced on the character of our dead Vice-President, for we can challenge for it universal respect and admiration; but should we not in all cases deal charitably with the living as well as with the dead? We have been told on Divine authority that faith, hope, and charity are the cardinal virtues, and the greatest of these is charity. Not that charity which merely relieves suffering humanity, but that broader charity which judges leniently the motives and actions of men, which tells us to do unto others as we would have others do unto us—that sublime charity inculcated by our Saviour. In the friction caused by political differences and in the heat of party strife we too often indulge in a bitterness toward our opponents as unjust as it is uncharitable. Motives are impugned, actions misrepresented, facts distorted, and character assailed in this partisan warfare. And yet when one of the great actors in the political arena falls all animosities are buried with him, and in the awful presence of Death friends and foes alike strive to do justice to his merits and to pay homage to his memory. Recognizing this fact, which does honor to human nature, can we not agree to disagree without malice? Can we not believe that men may be honest and conscientious even though they differ with us? In a word, can we not be charitable in our judgment of our fellow-men?

> Human nature is but clay
> Truly blessed by charity.

These reflections have naturally suggested themselves to my mind by the scene presented here to-day and by others of a similar character which have so often of late transpired in this Chamber. Time and again, during my brief service here, have I seen these mournful ceremonies re-enacted, and on each have members of opposing parties, clasping hands over the grave of a colleague, paid willing homage to his virtues, while the mantle of charity was thrown over his faults. These scenes, which prove the brotherhood of mankind, and show that "one touch of nature makes the whole world kin," have left a deep impression on my mind, and that impression was indelibly fixed by the extraordinary spectacle presented at the funeral of General Grant. We all remember the inposing and touching ceremonies of that mournful occasion, and certainly no one who witnessed them can ever forget them. But the feature that struck me as the most significant, the most impressive, was the fact that among those who bore the body of the great captain of the Union Army to the grave were confederate soldiers, who a few brief years ago were his mortal enemies.

Democrats and Republicans, men who wore the blue and those who wore the gray, met at his tomb to pay the last tribute of respect to his memory. Here to-day we, while honoring ourselves by doing honor to the memory of our late Vice-President, see exhibited the same kind and generous feelings which marked the obsequies of the dead ex-President. If then our political and personal animosities cease at the grave, should we not be tolerant, considerate, and charitable in the judgment we pass on our contemporaries, even though they be our political opponents? All of us, sooner or later, must claim from the living that tender recognition which we now bestow on the dead. For our hearts,

> Like muffled drums, are beating
> Funeral marches to the grave; and to that bourn we are hastening with steady and rapid steps. Fortunate indeed shall we be if when we reach that bourn we may be able to meet the Great Judge with a conscience void of offense toward God and man, as was his whose loss the country deplores.

> He, dying, leaveth as the sum of him
> A life-count closed, whose ills are dead and quit;
> Where good is quick and mighty, far and near,
> So that fruits follow it.
> No need hath such to live, as ye name life;
> That which began in him, when he began,
> Is finished; he has wrought the purpose through
> Of what did make him, man.

He has indeed left a life-count closed, without one blot or stain to mar its fair page, and in every relation of life he proved himself, in the highest and best sense, a man. Firm and sincere in his convictions; true to his friends; liberal toward his opponents; conscientious in the discharge of every duty; a patriot and a Christian, he surely deserved and doubtless has received that highest reward that can be bestowed on mortal or angel, the final decree of the Judge of all living, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." It is one of the inconsistencies, perhaps rather one of the infirmities, of human nature that in spite of all the blessed assurances of Christianity we grieve when those who are near or dear to us are taken away by death. We know that to those who are prepared to die death is but the gloomy portal through which they pass to the realms of eternal happiness, and this conviction should teach us that all grief for them is selfish; but neither philosophy nor religion can soothe the anguish which wrings our hearts when a dear friend or a beloved relative is borne to the grave.

> The blood will follow where the knife is driven;
> The flesh will quiver where the pincers tear.

Thus, when the good are called home, to enter on the true life beyond the grave, we grieve, not for them, but for ourselves. It is well with them; they have exchanged the sorrows, the sufferings, of this world for the glories of heaven; a daily death for life eternal. There is a beautiful thought expressed by one of our oldest poets which seems to me peculiarly appropriate when a good man, ripe in years and rich in honors, passes away from earth.

Speaking of our misuse of language, he says:

> We call here life * * * *
> Angels who live and know what 't is to be,
> Who all the nonsense of our language see;
> Who speak things, and our words, their ill-drawn pictures scorn,
> When we, by a foolish figure say,
> "Behold an old man dead!" then they > Speak properly and cry, "Behold a man-child born!"

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, in pausing a while in our public duties to pay our tributes to the memory of a conspicuous actor in the scenes that have transpired in this Chamber during this generation we naturally leave to the Senators from Indiana the more formal statements of the principal events of his life and of the qualities of heart and mind that endeared him to the people of the State in which he lived and secured him the preference and support of a broader constituency for the second executive office of the United States.

All that we who have been co-workers with him in the public service can do is to add our gleanings to their store by a frank but kindly and charitable view of the part he took in our presence in the common duties of public life, and, better still as evidence of character, the part he took in private life as a citizen, an associate, and in all the relations of domestic life.

My first acquaintance with Mr. Hendricks was when he was Commissioner of Public Lands during part of the administrations of Presidents Pierce and Buchanan. In the discharge of the duties of this important office he was brought into contact chiefly with citizens of the Western States, whose titles are derived directly from the United States. His administration of this office is admitted to be without fault, for he was careful, patient, and industrious, and thus laid the foundation of his popularity in vast regions, the fruits of which he was to reap in after years. No one was more familiar than he with the history and laws of the new States and Territories that have been rapidly developed from the vast public domain extending from the Ohio to the Pacific Ocean. He voluntarily retired from this position in 1859 to resume the practice of law, which appears always to have been his favorite occupation. In March, 1863, he took his seat as a member of this body. For six years he was by far the most active and influential Senator of his political party, always taking the lead in directing and expounding the policy of his associates on the innumerable questions that grew out of the conduct of the war or that sprang from the results of the war. No period of American history has presented questions of equal difficulty or importance, for they involved not merely old divisions of domestic policy for which the Constitution furnished a guide, but also very many problems that the framers of the Constitution did not provide for and did not conceive could arise. It was during this period of Mr. Hendricks's life that he established the influence over his party which he never lost. Though rarely agreeing with him, I bear willing testimony to the marked ability with which he maintained his opinions. Always plausible in argument and courteous in debate, ready in resources and never violent in manner or statement, he satisfied his friends and did not irritate his adversaries. His speeches were evidently carefully prepared, but rarely read when delivered; his argument was clear and his language copious, rarely pausing for a word or phrase, but moving smoothly on like a full river. If his premises were admitted it was difficult to resist his conclusions, and the weak points of his position were carefully guarded by plausible arguments.

The reconstruction of the Southern States was, perhaps, the most frequent subject of his speeches, and upon this he early took the position that as a question of law the events of the war did not and could not disturb the relation of the State to the Federal Union; that its existence as a State, its organization as a State, its constitution continued all the way through the war, "and when peace came it found the State with its constitution and its laws unrepealed and in full force, holding that State to the Federal Union." He, therefore, opposed every bill containing a safeguard deemed by others necessary as a condition precedent to the restoration of the State to the Union, and every amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed as a condition precedent to the full exercise of the powers of a State. Unlike his distinguished colleague, Governor Morton, who shared with him during a part of his term the honor of representing Indiana in this body, Senator Hendricks adhered to and maintained in many famous debates his opinion as to the right of States lately in rebellion to unconditional restoration when the war was over.

The heat of the contest is now over, and we may calmly look back upon the past contentions as founded upon honest differences of opinion and fairly weigh the merits of the great actors in the battles of war or debate, and especially so when one by one they disappear from the living and join the great army of the dead. Viewed from this standpoint, we must acknowledge that Vice-President Hendricks in his public life was a learned lawyer, studious, diligent, and successful; a trusted and honored governor of his State, always retaining the affection and respect of those who knew him best; a faithful and honest officer in a position of high trust in an executive branch of the National Government; a member of each House of Congress of unquestioned ability and integrity, faithful to his convictions as tested by the principles which he openly avowed and ably defended, and by these tests true to his party and country, and as such was rewarded by the people of the United States with the second office in their gift.

If we turn from his public life and view him as a man, in all the varied relations of life, we can pronounce his eulogy without the qualification of opposing opinions. That he was honorable and just in all business affairs has not been questioned. He was easy of approach, affable and kind, carrying into his private life none of the bitterness of political strife. He was a man of good habits and temperate, plain, of unblemished character, the best type of an American citizen. He was a lover of order, peace, and, if not a member of a religious society, he respected and observed the obligations of religion and morality, and, more important than all else in human society, he was faithful to his duty to his kindred and family, and left us an example of purity and honor in private life. It is these virtues, far more than genius, learning, or intellectual force, that make our late presiding officer worthy of the high praise this day bestowed upon him by his surviving associates in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the announcement of the death of Governor Hendricks was received with sincere expressions of regret throughout the country.

For more than a quarter of a century he had been known as a statesman of enlarged views and commanding influence and was held in high esteem not only by those who knew him personally, but also by a much larger number who knew him only from the reputation earned by a long life of eminent public service.

It is proper that recognition should be made of distinguished worth and merit in the lives of public men and that due honors should be paid to their memories after they have passed away. It is perhaps the universal desire of the living to be remembered by those who survive and succeed them—a desire springing from no inordinate self-esteem, but innately implanted in the human breast as an incentive to honorable and useful lives among men.

It would be impossible to estimate the influence of this laudable ambition upon human action or measure its value upon the happiness and well-being of society, but it may be affirmed that it has inspired the hopes and shaped the lives of many of the most illustrious and distinguished men both of ancient and modern times.

The commemoration of the characters of deceased public men, who by their labors and talents have attained to acknowledged distinction is not only a just tribute to their memories, but an inducement to the living to emulate their virtues and imitate their examples of usefulness and honor. There have been but few public men who commanded more respect or whose memories will be held in higher regard by the people of the country than Governor Hendricks, and it is especially appropriate that the Senate should give expression to the respect entertained for the memory of one who so lately presided over its deliberations. Such expression is due not only on account of the high official station which he held at the time of his death and his consequent connection with this body, but also because of the eminent ability and fidelity displayed in every position, State and Federal, he was called upon to fill.

His private virtues and the record of his public life as governor of Indiana, as Representative in Congress, and as Senator from his State, have been eloquently presented in the addresses to which we have listened. Such a life, so free from reproach, so faithful to every trust, needs no encomium. The simple record of its "living action" is the proper measure of its usefulness and its highest and most appropriate eulogy.

Governor Hendricks was endowed by nature with fine intellectual powers, which were developed and strengthened by a culture and discipline that enabled him to comprehend more readily and accurately the various questions which demanded his attention both in public and private life. His conclusions were not mere impressions derived from intuitive perception, but were the result of careful investigation and reason. Hence he was cautious in the expression of opinions until they had been clearly and definitely formulated in his own mind by deliberate thought and reflection. This fact gave great weight to his opinions upon all questions upon which they were expressed and inspired a reliance upon his judgment on the part of others which was seldom found to have been misplaced.

His studious habits in early life and careful attention to the business intrusted to his care, prompted by a laudable ambition for success in his profession and distinction among men, soon attracted attention and brought him into notice in his own State. He entered public life in the prime of manhood, and retained until the day of his death the unabated confidence of those among whom he lived, and indeed I may say of a very large portion of the people of the whole country.

Governor Hendricks was not unknown when he entered this Chamber as a Senator from Indiana, having served in the other House of Congress and filled an important position in an Executive Department of the Government during the administration of President Pierce. His service in the Senate brought him still more prominently before the country and furnished the opportunity for establishing that national reputation for ability and statesmanship which has since been accorded to him.

He took his seat in this body at a time when free discussion was somewhat restrained by a spirit of intolerance throughout the country and which was at times manifested in this Chamber, usually so indulgent to honest differences of opinion. He entered promptly, however, into the debates of the Senate, and was often compelled to antagonize with earnestness measures which he deemed unwise and pernicious, displaying an ability which gained the admiration of friends and commanded the respect of those whose views and measures he was compelled to oppose.

The services rendered by Governor Hendricks while in official station by no means measure the value of his life either to his State or the country. For many years he had held a place in public estimation that enabled him to impress his views upon the country and to no small extent influence the opinions and actions of others upon important public questions.

It is not necessarily the case that those in official position exert the greatest influence in the determination of public matters or render the most important service to the country. In a republican government like our own a well-defined public opinion upon subjects requiring legislative or administrative action must sooner or later be heeded and obeyed. It may, for a time, be disregarded and even contemned and despised, but it will ultimately assert its power and find the means of compelling obedience to its behests. He, therefore, who enjoys such a measure of public confidence as enables him to direct to any considerable extent public thought and opinion will, although in private life, have no small share in the control of public affairs.

One thing is certain: Governor Hendricks while a private citizen (if at any time for many years he could be regarded as such) suffered no diminution in the esteem of his countrymen or in the weight and influence of his opinion upon their judgment and action. He had for a long time been recognized as one of the ablest and most trusted leaders of the Democratic party of his State and of the country, and to the wisdom of his counsels and his great personal popularity as its candidate for the Vice-Presidency is that party largely indebted for its present control of the executive branch of the Government.

It would not be proper on this occasion to occupy the time requisite to speak of all the elements that entered into and made up the symmetrical character of Governor Hendricks. I may, however, be allowed to refer to the respect he entertained and manifested for the sentiments and wishes of the body of the people. No station, however exalted, could sever the tie of sympathy which united him to them or render him indifferent to their judgment or forgetful of their interests. This was no assumed virtue, but a tribute paid by a heart instinctively in harmony with the popular thought and feeling to the honesty and practical good sense of the masses of mankind. There is reason to believe that too many public men undervalue the average intelligence of those they represent and do not pay that deference to their judgment to which it is entitled. Governor Hendricks was not of the class of men who seek to magnify their own importance by refusing recognition of merit in others, but had learned from personal contact to place a proper estimate upon the honesty of the people and a proper respect for the deliberate judgments they had formed. His appreciation of his fellow-citizens was reciprocated on their part by the attachment which neither success nor defeat could interrupt or diminish.

For some reason, which it might be difficult to explain, there seems to be less recognition of distinguished service and worth in civil life than is awarded to merit in another sphere. In this and perhaps in every other country the highest value is placed upon the services of successful military men and the highest honors paid to their memories after they are dead. It is meet and proper that full and just acknowledgment of gratitude should be made to those who have risked their lives in defense of their country's rights and honor. Is there any reason why equal recognition should not be made of valuable and distinguished services in civil life, and equal honors perpetuate the memories of statesmen who have served their country with no less fidelity and zeal for its honor and welfare?

Washington and his companions in arms who fought the battles of the Revolution and achieved the independence of the Colonies will be gratefully remembered while patriotism inspires the human heart or history records the great events of time. But who will say that Washington and his army in the field were more patriotic or rendered more valuable service to the American people than Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, Madison, and their compatriots in council, who formulated and established our republican system of government and secured to our posterity the blessings of civil and religious liberty?

Thiers concludes his History of the Consulate and Empire of Napoleon by a brief review of the career of Alexander, Hannibal, and Cæsar as compared with that of the emperor. With the achievements of these great captains he contrasts the life and labors of Charlemagne, who in the ninth century threw off the barbarism in which he was born and by which he was surrounded and peacefully united the alienated portions of his country, brought order out of confusion, established schools for the instruction of his people, and elevated them from barbarism to a fair degree of enlightenment and civilization.

I shall attempt no comparison between the eminent soldiers and statesmen of our own country. Their fields of labor and usefulness have lain in different directions, and both have done well in the spheres in which they have been called to act. Both have assisted in the maintenance of free institutions in the land and will fill honored pages in their country's history. It may, however, be affirmed, without injustice to any, that constitutional government and individual rights in this as well as every other country will find their surest protection in the wisdom and patriotism of the men who make and execute the laws.

There have not been wanting at any time since the adoption of the Constitution able and fearless statesmen to uphold and defend the full measure of liberty which it was intended to secure to the American people. May we not indulge the hope that the future history of the country shall witness no abatement in the devotion of her public men to the free institutions which are the birthright and should ever be the heritage of her citizens?

The past is safe. Whatever may be the destiny of the Republic, its century of history has been marked by unparalleled advancement in material wealth and prosperity and a greater degree of freedom and happiness to its citizens than was ever before vouchsafed to any portion of the human race.

The perpetuation of constitutional government and the liberty which it secures, by maintaining the checks and balances imposed upon the co-ordinate departments of the Government, and while upholding in full force and vigor the just powers of Federal authority, opposing with manly firmness every attempted encroachment upon the liberties of the people and the reserved rights of the States, is the obligation resting upon American statesmen in every period of the country's history.

In the discharge of that duty Governor Hendricks, in his day and generation, performed well his part, and has left to posterity the results of a useful life, a spotless record, and an honored name.

Mr. EVARTS. When, Mr. President, in the arrangements by which the Senate should so properly offer the tribute of its respect and affection in memory of one whose loss they deplore, it was thought right to include myself among those who should participate in the presentation of the feelings of the Senate, it would seem, perhaps, that no other relations would have suggested the propriety of this selection except as an observer of the distinguished career of a member of an opposite party and a citizen of a distant State.

But it so happens that I had a very considerable acquaintance with Mr. Hendricks, dating to quite an early period in his public career. When in attendance upon the Supreme Court, many years ago, I first formed his personal acquaintance; and then, at an age when probably he was not far advanced beyond that of middle life, as it is construed, he was pointed out to me as a person of interest, and who should engage my attention, as one who, in the career upon which he had entered, and from the progress which he had made in it, was, naturally and probably, a future candidate for, and successful aspirant to, the Presidency of the United States. However strange it seemed to me that so early in a man's career so great prognostics could be safely or wisely made of him, from that time onward there has never been an occasion in which I have been brought into relations with Mr. Hendricks that it did not recall to my mind that sentiment and that expectation respecting him.

About twenty years ago, too, it came in my way, in the practice of my profession, to represent great interests in an important lawsuit in the city of Cincinnati, in which was arrayed against us a numerous body of the important and powerful members of our profession in that great State, so full of excellent lawyers. The aid also of Governor Hendricks, from his neighboring State was called in by our opponents. I had then an opportunity not only of forming myself an opinion of his abilities and his force as a lawyer, but also of perceiving the impression he made upon the public about him, on the profession of the two States, and on their judiciary. From all this a lawyer might fairly form during the period of the trial, which lasted a fortnight, an estimate, and a correct estimate, of the power and value of another. As I recall the matter, Mr. Hendricks was regarded upon the other side as the leader in that array, and upon our side was felt as the most formidable and the most competent contestant.

But on a later scene of much greater import I also had an opportunity to estimate the character, the eloquence, the intelligence, the courage of Mr. Hendricks, and the value of his constitutional opinions. I mean on the great occasion of the impeachment of the President. In this Chamber, as I recall the trial, the division between parties was such that thirty-five represented the full Senate of the Republicans and but twelve Democratic Senators were present to counterbalance in any form or any degree this superiority of numbers. During the three months of that great debate, and in the course of the delivery of opinions, so fully made up by the contributions from the Senators on the Republican side and the few who could participate on the part of the Democratic party, it may be easily understood that Mr. Hendricks (who then, I think, it must be admitted, held the lead of that small band of Democrats who then occupied seats in the Senate) was relied on on that side of the Chamber for his wisdom, for his courage, for his ability as a lawyer, for his learning and experience in constitutional matters of debate.

I think now, as I thought then, that among the eminent men who took part in the preparation and delivery of opinions, and those who took part in the debates, not infrequent, of an interlocutory nature, no man appeared better in his composure of spirit, in his calmness of judgment, in the circumspect and careful deliberation with which, avoiding extreme extravagances, he drew the line which should mark out fidelity to the Constitution, as distinguished from addiction to the supremacy of party interests and party passions.

Of course, during that period the proprieties of my position did not permit personal intercourse with Senators upon either side; but during the many days, the many hours of each day, that this great transaction passed before my eyes, and recalling them now, it seems to me that there was no position, there was no argument, there was no purpose and no plan in the conduct of that debate, as represented by Mr. Hendricks, that was not in accordance with the whole duty of a Senator performing a grave part in one of the greatest political transactions that any free government has had, or shall have, occasion to witness.

Mr. President, it is just twenty-five years ago that, in the last days of this same month of January, a Senator from Mississippi bade, as he expressed it in his own phrase, a final adieu to the Senate, in obedience to his obligations to his State. As we in memory recall the perilous experiments upon the Constitution, upon the Government, upon the power of this nation, that were practiced by and during the civil war, and as we now find that this Chamber is full—every State represented in its full competency under the Constitution, this alley dividing, in scarcely unequal strength, the two parties—as we witness the reciprocal respect and kindness between the members of the two great parties represented on this floor, we can not but feel that not from the foundation of this Government to the present time, nor under the ancient governments who count in their parliamentary duration hundreds of years, will you find a nearer approach in personal kindness and mutual respect between opposite parties than now mark the sentiments and the conduct toward each other of these two political parties. Yet, as I have said, but twenty-five years have elapsed between that opening event that I have adverted to and this present scene of common respect over the bier of the deceased Vice-President.

Sir Robert Peel once said, on a fitting occasion, to Lord Brougham, that "the contact of party produces a warmth of feeling toward those who sit around us; but the eye is a cold and jealous scrutinizer of those who are opposite to us." Whatever distrust should qualify, therefore, on this side of the Senate, our estimate of the leader of an opposing party conducting his career while the country was under the stress of its threatened division and its restoration was attended by the aggravations and solicitudes that marked its progress to our present firm security, I think I may be allowed to say that looking at those who are opposite to us—that looking at the whole matter and running over the principal occurrences and the principal relations of Mr. Hendricks to them, this Republican party would have at all times felt that he was fairly entitled from his own party—in their opinions, in their affections, in their support—to the highest places that their suffrages should be able to offer to him.

Something has been said about his being a partisan. I know by no instruction of my observation, nor by anything that I can draw from history, any other mode of conducting the debates of a great and free people except by means of great and firm parties. I believe, therefore, that steadfast and intrepid adhesion to a party is a merit, and I believe that political contests fail much of their service to the country when steadfast and intrepid adherence to political leaders is neglected on the part of the mass of a party.

Whatever be the debates in human affairs that best illustrate the contests of party under a free government, whether they are best likened to the litigations of the profession before the courts or to battles between combatants upon the scenes and perils of war, I believe that it is equally essential to the service in all these forms that there should be neither betrayal nor desertion on the one side, nor timidity or hesitation on the other part. Undoubtedly, irretrievably for the time, the issues involved may be lost where these disparaging elements of a manly contest shall intervene, but nevertheless such inconclusive and spurious determinations tend to inflame the unassuaged animosities and provoke a renewal of the old hostilities.

I may say then, Mr. President, that my estimate of the late Vice-President is that of an eminent lawyer. Certainly his eloquence was persuasive and effective. Certainly his method of forensic address was quite admirably free of all superfluity. If it be truly said, as I believe it is truly said, that the greatest trait in the greatest of orators, notwithstanding all the splendor of his eloquence, Demosthenes, was that, more than all other orators, he was distinguished by the fact of the absolute directness with which every movement in his conduct of the debate was governed, that no superfluous word was used, none taken for ornament but always for effect, we must, at least in our profession, consider these traits that I have ascribed to the forensic eloquence of Mr. Hendricks worthy of admiration.

As a statesman, if he has been more usually looked at in the aspect to which I have referred, as a great political leader, it will be found, I think, that he was always governed by inborn convictions, and that he was directed, in the particular situations, by inbred opinions. I do not find in his career any of that versatility of opinion for the nonce or of alliance to this or that particular movement that was to affect for the present time only. He was always of that sentiment which he ascribed to the prevailing sentiment of the Democratic party, and if it might be unhappy for him, as it was unhappy for all of us, that there should have been such a severe and peremptory discrimination in the antagonisms between the two parties from the gravity and the stress of the affairs of the nation, nevertheless I take it it must be said that he is entitled to the credit of having been a consistent, an intelligent, a prudent, a patient, and a courageous statesman in the service of the Democratic party, which he had espoused and to which he unflinchingly adhered.

Mr. President, these ceremonies and these eulogies in the presence of the dead are never formal and never commonplace. However frequently brought to the notice of mortals, death is never formal and never commonplace. However men may lead their lives, in the market-place, in the courts, in the Senate, at the head of armies, in the crowds of popular applause, a man must always die alone. Whether death shall approach us in the form of a sudden summons, a tragic fate, or by slow progress, sensibly to ourselves, visibly to those around us, the eye shall grow dim and the natural force abate, death is a fearful visitor. Whether his intrusion overtakes one in the towers of kings or in the cabins of the poor, the supreme event, wherein this mortal puts on immortality, swallows up all incidents and circumstances as trivial and impertinent. From these contemplations, Mr. President, whether in the close chamber of the dying, or on the wide scene of public bereavement and national lamentation, the wisest may learn new wisdom and the boldest feel the mastery of an invincible antagonist.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, it was with no ordinary emotion that I received the request of the distinguished Senator from Indiana to unite in rendering these solemn honors to the late Vice-President. When I thought of the profound sorrow with which North Carolina was stricken at the death of Mr. Hendricks, and the sincere regard which her people in their hearts had for years cherished for his character, I knew that I could not adequately express their deep sympathy in the supreme bereavement of Indiana, nor their grief at the great loss which the whole country had sustained.

It is no common tie that binds together the people of these two States. The sons and daughters of North Carolina were among the earliest settlers of Indiana, and of all the States of the mighty West Indiana still presents the most attractive homes to the emigrants from North Carolina. There is scarcely a fireside in that beautiful State around which, I am told, some hallowed North Carolina association does not linger, and but few family circles in whose veins the blood of North Carolina fathers or mothers does not flow. Nor will North Carolina soon forget that the distinguished subject of these services, recognizing the claims which her Revolutionary patriots had to the gratitude of mankind, left his home across the Ohio and came to Charlotte, in that State, to unite with her people on the 20th of May, 1875, in commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the immortal day on which the "Men of Mecklenburg" proclaimed the "first declaration of independence" in America.

Mr. President, the duty of rendering appropriate and truthful testimony to the life and services of Indiana's great son has been so well performed by his distinguished friend, the Senator from that State, that nothing can add force or luster to the presentment which he has made. That presentment is now enrolled in the Senate, and I must say here, sir, that it will take its place among the best monuments of either ancient or modern times that friendship and affection, aided by learning and eloquence, have erected to those who deserved them. If, sir, all record of the life and services of the late Vice-President should be obliterated, his name would be preserved for long ages in that precious casket in which the genius and the devotion of his friend has enshrined his memory. The Vice-President was fortunate in his biographer; the generous Senator was fortunate in his subject. I can but repeat the feeblest echoes of that grand tribute from a friend to a friend.

It is almost impossible to estimate the value to mankind of a great and good life. Custom and experience have assigned prices to most of the treasures of the world, but no effort of the mind has been able to measure and determine the worth of a great character. No comprehensible limits can be affixed to the extent, the continuance, the diversity, and the power of its influences for good. Like the sun giving perpetual heat and light to the material universe, a great and good man is a source of intelligence and beneficence to the whole human family through all time. Nor do the trifling spots upon the sun nor the similar imperfections of the man sensibly diminish the splendor or the usefulness of either.

It is in the contemplation of a very distinguished life and character that we are now engaged. We, Mr. President, are too near Mr. Hendricks to write his history. Time is the essential element of just history, and to that tribunal must be referred the final judgment of all the actions of men. The late Vice-President is still almost one of us; his very image is before us as he sat in the chair which you occupy and presided over the Senate. We can almost behold him now—his form, his face, his every action; his very words seem to linger with their soft tones on our ears; his shadow has barely passed the doors of the Senate Chamber. The excitement of one of the greatest political contests in history in which he was a leader has not subsided in our bosoms. We are not his best judges; but this we all do know of him; it is in letters of living light before our eyes: Here was a man who for forty-three years was conspicuously before the public gaze; first as a lawyer in the courts of justice, that surest ordeal to test character; then successively in the Legislature of his State, the convention that framed the State constitution, in the House of Representatives of the United States, in a high position in an Executive Department of the Government, in the Senate of the United States, governor of his State, and Vice-President of the United States. He was twice nominated for Vice-President, and for sixteen years, from 1868 to 1884, was the choice of his State and a large proportion of his party for President.

For two generations of men, two ages, he was in the public service, constantly passing through the fires of adverse criticism, standing in the front battle-lines of party conflict, not only in peace but through war, not only in the councils of his State and the forums of the Union, but in the chief magistracy of his Commonwealth and in the Vice-Presidency of the United States, and there was not one blot or stain or shadow upon his robes. There was not a spot in his armor which had not received and repelled the spear of an adversary. In the high temples of justice and at the more sacred altars of home he was the same unsullied minister.

Search the annals of public men for centuries past and you will find but few parallels to this career. As we contemplate the series of these remarkable facts of his life, this long line of successes, these ever-ascending steps up the temple of fame to its very summit, this circle of unbroken confidence, beginning at his home, embracing a county, extending throughout a district, expanding over a State, widening, enlarging over a country of fifty millions of people, and still deepening at the center where it began, we shall know that all this was not the result of fortune or art or adventitious circumstance, but that the grand superstructure of his life was laid in deep and solid foundations, and reared in harmonious and enduring proportions.

Nothing, sir, but great intellectual ability, high moral excellence, invariable devotion to duty, and unwavering faith in the rectitude of his purposes could have achieved and maintained such results. The law of such a life must have been a constant aspiration for what was higher and better. It is a difficult undertaking to deceive continually one human being; it is simply an impossibility to impose for years on millions of people. From the incredulity, jealousy, suspicion, and scrutiny of such a host of watchers all the artifices of the subtlest political magician could not hide every trace of corruption or infidelity.

It would require, Mr. President, the genius of a Macaulay to analyze and delineate the qualities and traits that constituted the strength and grace of Mr. Hendricks's character. It will be an interesting and instructive study to the young statesmen of our country. They will find in it a model which it will be well to respect and difficult to improve. What was the mystery of his ever-increasing and enduring strength with the people? Why was there no shipwreck to his sails? Why was there no eclipse of that luminary? What made him the first man in the popular confidence of his State and second to no man in the esteem of the American people? What carried him safely and triumphantly through all the vicissitudes of a long, eventful, and trying public life? It was not military glory, for he was never a soldier. It was not eloquence, for he was not like Webster, an orator in the highest sense of the word. It was not charm of manner, for, though gracious and pleasant, he had not cultivated, like Chesterfield, the arts of grace as the means to an end. He originated no great popular measures, like Chatham and Clay. He never, like Crassus, possessed large wealth with which to win popular favor.

The whole truth is, sir, that he was the earnest, faithful, devoted champion and defender of the people's rights.

The sincerity of his devotion was the charm of his success. He was prudent, sagacious, laborious, wise. He consulted the people's interest just as he would have consulted his own interest. He never undertook to mislead, to deceive, or to inflame them. He never trifled with their liberties, their property, or their honor. He never attempted to dazzle them with false and glittering hopes, or to madden their prejudices and precipitate them into desperate perils. He was a brave, cautious, vigilant pilot, never departing from his chart or neglecting his compass. His positions were thoughtfully taken, securely fortified, and boldly defended. He was never surprised or deluded. He was misled by no false lights. He was so thoroughly prepared and equipped by labor, study, and attainment that he was always ready for and equal to the occasion. He was a sentinel who never left the post of duty.

He was not like noble Hector, towering over all the Trojans, but betrayed by proud hopes into fatal indiscretion.

He was not, like Achilles, superior alike to Greeks and Trojans, but cursed with passions stronger than himself and driven by mad revenge from the field of honor and duty to his sullen tents. But he was like Diomede and Ulysses, those pillars of the cause of Greece, ever sagacious, faithful, and prepared. Like them, he bore reverses with dignity and composure, and was equally modest and reserved in victory. Like them, he was "equal to either fortune." He loved law and order and abhorred chaos. Like Socrates, he obeyed if he did not respect the law, and, like that greatest of Athenian patriots, would with his last breath have sacrificed to the law, as to the majesty of his country, even if it destroyed himself. He was never eccentric or meteoric or convulsive; and though he never shone with the magnitude and intense splendor of Aldebaran, he yet constantly exhibited the virtue and energy of the paler and serener star whose truth never varies. If he was not a Moses leading his people from Egyptian darkness through the wilderness, striking water from the rock, and invoking bread from the skies, he was the ever-faithful Joshua, "strong and very courageous, observing all the law as it was commanded unto him, and turning not from it to the right or to the left, and prospering wheresoever he went."

He did not stand among men like some majestic mountain with its proud head in the clouds wrapt in snow, an object of wonder and astonishment to all who behold it, but his life resembled the beautiful plain beneath studded with cities, villages, and happy homes, refreshed by cooling streams, abounding in fruitful fields, and bearing on its bosom the comforts and the blessings of men. He was always practical, useful, and efficient. He seems to me to have taken color and character from that great line of English statesmen who for eight hundred years have steadily maintained and advanced the growth of liberty and law, and wisely avoided the convulsions and upheavals and collapses of the neighboring nations. His life and character were complete and rounded as a circle, and resemble the writings of Addison, of which it may be truly said that they are so simple, so pure, so strong, so full of grace, and so free from grossness, so clear with light, and so consistent with reason, that nothing can be added to them without marring their beauty and nothing can be detracted from them without impairing their force.

As Mr. Hendricks had been fortunate in life, so was he happy in the time and manner of his death. While yet in the full maturity and undiminished vigor of his faculties, with not one ray of his remarkable intelligence obscured or dimmed, honored among all men, in the declining year, in the beautiful autumn, before hoary winter has laid his icy hand upon the bosom of nature, at that ripe season when the yellow fields are rendering up all their richest harvests, at his own home, in the bosom of those whom he loved and who loved him, he passed without a pang from this world, with hallowed accents on his lips of the reality of that perfect "freedom" which is the aspiration of good men everywhere. How beautiful is the sunset of autumn when twilight gently lingers between day and night and the glory of the sun does not retire until the curtain is softly lifted and the glory of the stars appears. Fitting crown to the life of a Christian statesman in a Government whose vital fire is religious liberty.

And, sir, to me, I must say, speaking from my heart, that the death of Mr. Hendricks and of the other illustrious men of our country which immediately preceded it were fortunate in illustrating the great, supreme, blessed truth that we are again all one people, united together in affection to each other in a common and devoted love to our whole country, its liberties and honor. From all the Southern States come up sincere, deep, overflowing sympathy and sorrow at the bereavement of their Northern sisters. Our tears mingle with yours over the graves of your great dead, your countrymen and our countrymen. Thank Almighty God that the "everlasting covenant" of our Union is established in the hearts of all our people, and that in the clouds of this sorrow we can behold the bow of peace never to be broken.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not affect to believe that I can worthily add to the eloquent and impressive eulogies which have been pronounced in the hearing of the Senate, but I desire nevertheless to speak a word of tribute to the memory of Mr. Hendricks. On the day he became Vice-President I came a stranger into the Senate, and as I stood before him to take from his lips the oath of office he gave to me, as a native of Indiana and the son of one whom in years long gone he had known in professional life, a warm and friendly greeting, and later, during the executive session, he supplemented that greeting by courtesy so considerate and kindly, that I have felt in his death something of the sense of personal loss.

The occasion on which I remember last to have seen him in the discharge of his official duty in this Chamber I shall never forget. Standing in his place there with ill-concealed emotion, and in tones which were low and trembling, he invited our attention to a dispatch just received, and there came to us from the Secretary's desk the words (happily then not quite true), "General Grant is dying," which hushed every sound here, bowed every head, and made the Senate in its sorrow that afternoon a representative body of all the people. How little we thought that before the autumn should have come and gone the familiar face then before us would fade forever from the sight of men.

The appropriate details of Mr. Hendricks's life, public, professional, and private, have been eloquently traced by the Senator from his State, his personal and political friend.

Mr. Hendricks belonged to a school in politics to which the associations and convictions of my life have brought me into bitter hostility, and of course I can not speak in approval of his attitude upon the great questions of the past, upon which the people of the country divided on party and sectional lines. To one or two phases of his career and belief I may, however, properly advert.

He was a man of strong convictions, and he had little respect for those who were otherwise. He was in no sense or way a trimmer in politics, although the contrary has been asserted of him. No public man ever lived to whom the favor and approval of the masses were sweeter than they were to Mr. Hendricks. Few public men ever lived whose course evoked bitterer criticism from his opponents than did his at times. The fact that he preferred to stem the tide of popular sentiment rather than to walk the easy open way to popular favor is at least conclusive of the strength of his convictions.

It had not long before his death become fashionable in some quarters to speak of him as a "spoilsman." If by this was meant that he desired the bestowal of office as a mere reward for party service upon unfit men or in violation of existing law, I believe, from conversation with him upon the subject, that the accusation was utterly groundless.

Mr. Hendricks was heart and soul a Democrat. He thoroughly believed in his party and in its principles. Indeed, I think if he might give direction to our words to-day he would bid us say of him that he was a partisan Democrat. He rightly thought that politics should be a matter of conviction, and that every man of firm political faith owed it to himself and to the country to be a partisan, in this, at least, that he should labor earnestly and in all fit ways best suited to his mental make-up and to his surroundings, to promote the success of the principles in which he believed. To him no political partisanship, honorable in its methods, was offensive. He fully realized the value of organization. He knew that no great charity even could be administered without it, and that the command laid upon the apostles, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," can not be efficiently obeyed without organized efforts and partisan service. He recognized the plain necessity for party organization, and in the party he saw only the instrumentality through which, and through which alone, might be wrought out the triumph of his principles.

In active, faithful, honorable party service he saw, therefore, devotion to principle, not mere lust for office. He believed that the party clothed by the popular will with the responsibility of administration should everywhere intrust the execution of its policies to those who were in political sympathy with it and who had at heart its continued and completest success. He believed that those of the ruling party who had done the most and sacrificed the most in honorable active party effort should, if fit for public duty, be by that party everywhere first called to public service. Steadfastness in faith he thought reasonably entitled to the honor of such recognition. He saw it thus in law, in medicine, in science, in business, in education, and in every other department of mental and physical effort, and he could not embrace a new philosophy which in politics alone denied it a place.

He had a tender feeling in his heart for the men who for twenty-four years, in sunshine and in storm, had led his party again and again to certain defeat, who had kept alive its organization in every State and county and town, and who had, by unwavering allegiance and effort, made possible its ultimate success; and he could not brook, with any degree of patience, the suggestion, in the hour of his party's triumph, that such men should be reproachfully termed "politicians" and denied recognition lest some political "æsthete" should say, "it is a reward for party service."

The imputation that he was a "spoilsman" rather angered than it grieved him, for he knew it came from those who had either been of a hostile camp, or, if of his own, had been wont to linger in the shade and slumber while he and the "boys," as he loved sometimes to call the party workers, had borne the heat and dust and burden of the battle.

Spoilsman or not, he went down to his grave loved, trusted, and mourned by his party, and I dare to believe that the element of party fealty which brought to him this reproach will not cause his memory to suffer with the great mass of his opponents.

The private life of Mr. Hendricks was stainless, and the record of his public service is without a venal blot. In the fierce heat of party warfare in which he was a leader, in the bitter condemnation which at times his course invited, no man has ever dared to couple with the name of Hendricks the suspicion of corruption.

As a public officer, he was faithful to every detail of duty. He took great pride in his administration of the General Land Office many years ago, and frequently referred to it. He brought to the discharge of that duty peculiar fitness, and ordained rules and methods of procedure there to the wisdom of which each year since intervening has brought gratifying vindication.

To the ability and industry and attentiveness with which he discharged the Senatorial duty the records of the Senate bear permanent and abundant testimony.

As a lawyer, he won, deserved, and sustained a national reputation for learning and professional skill. His brethren of the bar and the judges before whom he practiced bear concurrent testimony to his singular excellence as an advocate. As alert to discover and attack the weak points in the armor of his adversary as he was to recognize and protect the weak points in his own, he gave hard blows and took them with unruffled temper. When success crowned his efforts as a lawyer he was modest and considerate, and when the standard which he had borne went down in defeat he was patient and serene. Whatever the fortunes of the professional contest, he never grumbled at the court or anathematized the jury.

As an orator, he was persuasive and attractive. There was a quality in his voice and a charm in his manner which gave him command of his audience.

He was a genial, gracious, kindly gentleman, who treated all who came within the circle of his influence, rich or poor, exalted or lowly, with the same rare and exquisite courtesy.

To him life's sun has set. For him life's cares are ended. He is, in the words borne upon his dying breath, "free at last."

There is, Mr. President, a melancholy comfort in the manner of his death. He died as one might wish to die who was as well prepared to die. In his own home, in the midst of the friends and neighbors of many years, at the capital of the State which loved him and which he loved, in the tender care of her who was nearest and dearest, without premonition or pain of parting, "God's finger touched him, and he slept."

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the best and bravest knight in all the Democratic host has gone down before that relentless foe against whose assault courage and skill are alike unavailing.

To others I shall leave the recital of his public career, illustrated by great and patriotic service, State and national. To me it is a melancholy pleasure to think and speak of his character and attributes as I knew them in the arena where we first met, and where I learned to follow him as a leader and love him as a friend.

Thomas A. Hendricks was the incarnation of the vital principle in our Government, the sovereignty of the people. He knew the people and was nearer their hearts than any living man.

He was the noblest type of American manhood, self-reliant and self-made, incorruptible in public life and pure in private conduct. To the poor and humble he was always accessible, listening patiently and never refusing sympathy and aid. Stern and uncompromising as an adversary, he was just and courteous to the bitterest opponent, and when the conflict ended gentle, kind, and loving as a woman.

He was a partisan in the highest and best meaning of the term, devoted to his party because he believed it necessary to the welfare and glory of his country. So believing, he fought for party as for country, and there was not a rivet in his armor that had not been tried by edge of sword and point of spear. Cool, wary, undaunted, he led every forlorn hope, and around his banner ebbed and flowed the headlong fight.

He was an honest partisan, and had no respect for that political æstheticism which can not distinguish friend from foe. He believed the aims of party should be high, ennobling, patriotic, and that the instrumentalities and agencies to attain these aims must necessarily be friendly, not inimical.

Asking and giving no quarter, he did not sprinkle rosewater over the enemies of his party, or give sweetmeats to the political wolves and tigers ready to spring at its throat.

He died suddenly, as falls a chieftain on some stricken field; and it was well. Better one pang, one throb, than weeks of pain and slow decay. Better to fall like the struck eagle, whose full-stretched wing droops in mid-heaven above the mountain-top, than to writhe through weary days and sleepless nights waiting "the inevitable hour."

Pure in life, prepared for death, his career rounded and complete, our great leader, crowned with the love and respect of his countrymen, and breathing with his latest words the name of one dearer to him than all else, passed into that shadowy realm where his expectant spirit awaits her coming.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the principal incidents in the public career of Mr. Hendricks have been so fully and eloquently depicted by those who have preceded me as to make it not only unnecessary but even inappropriate that I should attempt anything like a biographical sketch of the distinguished dead. A brief allusion to some of the incidents of our long acquaintance and to some of his personal and professional traits, as I observed them, must constitute my tribute to his memory. His political career was a long and conspicuous one. He had a very strong and endearing hold upon a wide and widening circle of political friends. It can not be safely said that his popularity had culminated at the time of his death, for we can not read the future. But it can safely be said that it had not waned. He seemed never to have been more loved and admired by his political friends than upon that day when death's sudden message separated him from them.

The fact that he maintained so long, as well in reverse as in success, the clear leadership of his party in the State of Indiana—that in its extreme needs it always called for him—is convincing proof that he possessed in a high degree those qualities of mind and disposition that attract the love of men and inspire hope and confidence. He was not aggressive as a leader, but always met an assault with vigor and courage. He was shrewd, prudent, and quiet, rather than rash or boisterous in his methods. He did not make his leadership offensive by a too open assertion or display of it, but molded and guided by suggestion rather than by decree. No leader was ever more accessible to friends of every degree, none ever accepted counsel more kindly, or more wisely and cordially applauded the efforts of the aspiring young men who delighted to follow his political fortunes. His manner as a public speaker was animated and graceful. In style he was clear, often pungent, and always persuasive. Large audiences always assembled to hear him, and if he did not win over his adversaries, he left them kindly disposed, and always strengthened and consolidated his own party. More than once he was called by the unanimous voice of his party to accept a nomination that he did not want. He could not resist the friendly urgency of his party associates, and yielded his preferences to theirs at great personal inconvenience and sacrifice. My first vote was cast against Mr. Hendricks, as the candidate of his party for Congress, in the year 1854. The first joint meeting with a political opponent in which I was ever engaged was with Mr. Hendricks. He was the Democratic candidate for governor in 1860, and I, then a very young man, was the Republican candidate for reporter of the decisions of the supreme court. By chance, during the campaign of that year, we met at Rockville and found that our meetings were announced for the same hour and place. It was arranged that we should hold a joint meeting. Mr. Hendricks spoke first, and I well recall the effect of his persuasive address upon a responsive audience and upon myself as I sat before him, waiting in great trepidation for my time to come. When he concluded, Mr. Hendricks, with great kindness, requested his friends to remain and hear me, and often afterward alluded in very kind terms to my youthful performance. It was an illustration of a prominent trait of his character, a disposition to encourage with kindly praise the efforts of young men. From that time forward in every political campaign we were both upon the stump in Indiana, the earnest advocates of the political principles of our respective parties. He thought the principles I advocated were adverse to the best interests of the country and said so, and with equal plainness and sincerity I criticised his public acts and political views, but I am not aware that either of us ever charged the other with overstepping the fair limits of public discussion.

It was as a practicing lawyer that I knew Mr. Hendricks best. Often associated with him in the trial of causes, I have seen him in the freedom of the office consultation and have listened to his arguments in court from the standpoint of an associate. Often upon adverse sides I have had occasion to feel the force of his simple and effective eloquence upon a jury. He was remarkably urbane and courteous in his manner as well to the members of the bar as to the court. Rarely out of temper, he was yet firm and courageous in the defense of his own rights and those of his client. I saw him once conduct with unflinching courage a civil cause for damages growing out of the trial during the war before a military commission of a citizen accused of disloyal practices. The supreme court had decided the imprisonment of his client to have been illegal, and his technical right to damages was clear. But the defendants were soldiers—some of them wounded soldiers—who had acted under military orders in the trial of his client.

No advocate ever had a stronger adverse current of popular opinion and sympathy to stem than did Mr. Hendricks in this case. A verdict for more than nominal damages was hopeless, and yet through a long trial Mr. Hendricks never faltered, but with the greatest tact and courage demanded of court and jury full damages for the long imprisonment his client had suffered.

Through his long public career Mr. Hendricks always maintained his connection with the law firm of which he had so long been a member except when holding an office the duties of which were incompatible with any professional employments. The profession was more to him than a means of livelihood. He was a thoughtful student of the philosophy of the law. The springs of human motive and action are uncovered to no one as they are to the lawyer, and to Mr. Hendricks this study did not end with the demands of a cause. He once said:

The law to me has always been a fascinating business. I never go into a court-room to try a case but it seems picturesque ground to me. I like to watch a case begin and expand and see the various kinds of characters that attend it.

Judge James S. Frazier, formerly one of the judges of the supreme court of Indiana, said of Mr. Hendricks at the memorial meeting of the bar of the State:

And yet he could pass from the floor of the Senate into the forum of justice and be a giant there. I witnessed this once with admiring wonder in our own supreme court while a member of it, and heard from him what the judges all regarded as being, in both matter and manner, the most masterly argument made in that court during a term of service of six years. There was no audience to inspire him—not more than half a dozen persons and the four judges. Popular applause was not to be won by the effort. The great lawyer argued like a lawyer should before a court the questions of law in his cause. That was all. But it was much, as attesting the manner of man he was as one of our profession.

In his private life Mr. Hendricks was even more fortunate than in his public life. The circle of his friendship was wider, for it went beyond the lines of a party. Those who sharply criticised his public acts found in his private life nothing to condemn and much to admire. Personal integrity, great kindness of heart, a wide human sympathy, and a pure home life were virtues that all accorded to him. The wife whom he wooed and wed when the first small gains of his profession gave promise of a safe future walked with him in loving affection to the end. The vow, "Till death do us part," had been kept.

In the first year of his term as Vice-President, in the midst of preparations to resume in this body the duties of his office, filled with pleasant anticipations of social intercourse, suddenly, as in the twinkling of an eye, the messenger of death called him. And yet Mr. Hendricks had not been without warning that death might come to him suddenly. A slight stroke of paralysis several years ago excited the solicitude of his friends, and no doubt turned his own thoughts toward the solemn hour. He did not, however, allow this danger to cloud his spirits or to drive him from the activities of life. Indeed, the last year of his life seemed to be unusually full of gladness and labor. It seemed to him better to expend the days that remained in useful labor rather than in vain complainings.

So at the post
Where He hath set me in His providence
I chose for one to meet Him face to face—
No faithless servant frightened from my task,
But ready when the Lord of the Harvest calls.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the resolutions before the Senate, and that the House of Representatives be advised of the action of the Senate thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously.

Mr. HARRISON. As a further mark of respect to the memory of Mr. Hendricks I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF BILLS.

On motion of Mr. WELLBORN, by unanimous consent the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles; which were severally referred to the Committee on Claims, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1366) for the relief of Boggs & Allen;

A bill (H. R. 2263) for the relief of Basil Moreland;

A bill (H. R. 2845) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust and pay to citizens of Idaho and Montana Territories expenses and losses incurred in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the years 1877 and 1878; and

A bill (H. R. 2855) for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Desmarais and others.

On motion of Mr. WELLBORN also, by unanimous consent the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3761) to quiet land titles in the State of Mississippi; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana (by request), by unanimous consent, introduced a resolution providing for the payment to House employés of the balance of the month's pay for the month in which they were discharged; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

MARTIN KENOFSKY.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3444, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that when the committees are called it is always in order to report back bills which have been improperly referred and ask to be discharged from their further consideration. If there be no objection, however, the change of reference will be made now. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3444) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenofsky.

There being no objection, the bill was referred to the Committee on Claims.

VINCENT BOWLIN.

Mr. COBB introduced a bill (H. R. 4829) granting a pension to Vincent Bowlin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING, POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. On the 18th of the present month the Chair laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Supervising Architect of an appropriation of $10,000 for the approaches to the United States post-office building at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Supposing that this was not a work already provided for by law, the Chair sent the communication to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Having since learned that the work is already authorized by law, the Chair thinks the reference should be changed to the Committee on Appropriations; and if there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and the change of reference was ordered accordingly.

CHARLES HALE.

Mr. LAFFOON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4830) for the relief of Charles Hale; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GREEN AND BARREN RIVER NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. LAFFOON, by unanimous consent, also submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to ascertain and report at the earliest practicable period upon what terms the franchise and property of the Green and Barren River Navigation Company in Kentucky can be obtained and conveyed to the United States so that said streams may be opened with their large commerce free to the people of the States.

BALANCES DUE TO AND FROM UNITED STATES.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I understand the call of States and Territories has now been completed. I desire on behalf of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to make the privileged report, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish for the information of this House a report of all balances due to and from the United States, as shown by the books of the offices of the Register and Sixth Auditor of the Treasury Department, from 1789 to the 30th of June, 1885.

That the Secretary of War and the Postmaster-General be directed to furnish reports of such balances as shown by the books of their respective Departments.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I am instructed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to ask for the adoption of the resolution which has just been read.

Mr. REED, of Maine. How does that resolution come before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. He supposes it was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Has it been referred?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine. [After a pause.] It does not appear either from the resolution itself or the report accompanying it that this has been referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Committees have not a general power of reporting what has not been referred to them.

Mr. SPRINGER. I introduced a resolution of that kind and had it referred to that committee, and I presume the committee has reported back the resolution.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. There was a resolution relating to this matter which was referred to the committee, but the Department communicated with the committee on the subject, and desired the resolution in a different form.

The SPEAKER. The committee should have reported back the original resolution with such amendments as they thought proper.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I will ask leave to withdraw the report for the present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the report is not properly before the House.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Perhaps with the assistance of his new clerk the gentleman can get it into proper form.

REPORT OF NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to make a privileged report, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution providing for the printing of 250 copies of the annual report of the president of the Board of Managers of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers (H. R. Mis. Doc. 259), respectfully report the same back to the House and recommend its passage. The estimated cost is $73.65.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That 250 copies of the annual report of the president of the Board of Managers of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers be printed for the use of the said homes.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. FARQUHAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION UNITED STATES STATUTES AND CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the bill (H. R. 598) to provide for the distribution of the Statutes of the United States and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to designated incorporated bodies, institutions, and associations within the several States and Territories; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION OF CERTAIN SHIPPING FEES.

Mr. DINGLEY, from the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 991, a bill (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels, and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill for which this is a substitute will be laid upon the table.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of standing and select committees for reports has been completed. The Chair will now recognize gentlemen who were not in their seats when their committees were called.

RED LAKE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. PEEL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with amendments, the bill (H. R. 1269) in relation to the Red Lake Indian reservation, in the State of Minnesota; which, with the amendments and the accompanying report, was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER K. SHEPARD.

Mr. MCKENNA, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 33) for the relief of Alexander K. Shepard; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF FRANK SOULÉ.

Mr. MCKENNA, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 163) releasing the estate of Frank Soulé, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of the State of California, and his sureties on his official bond; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calender, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. M. LOBBAN.

Mr. MCKENNA, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back with amendments the bill (S. 416) for the relief of J. M. Lobban; which, with the amendments and the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the Chair will now proceed to call committees for one hour for the consideration of bills. The hour begins at twelve minutes before 4 o'clock.

Mr. SMALLS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce some bills for reference.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule of the House the Chair is compelled to proceed immediately with the second call of committees. After that is completed the Chair will recognize the gentleman to ask unanimous consent.

The Committee on War Claims was called.

Mr. GEDDES. I call up House bill No. 899 for present action, and with that view, if necessary, I will move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. What is the bill?

Mr. GEDDES. It is a bill based on the claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the Private Calendar, and can not be reached under this call.

THE REVISED STATUTES.

The Committee on the Judiciary was called.

Mr. TUCKER. I call up for present consideration the resolution which I reported the other day from the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a request to the Secretary of State to furnish to the House Library a number of copies of the Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested, if convenient, to transmit to the House, to be placed in its Library, 100 copies of the second edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States, with Supplement thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. TUCKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House resolution relative to the Revised Statutes, respectfully report back the resolution, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The Secretary of State has a large number of copies of the Revised Statutes and Supplement thereto on hand, and there are not enough in the possession of the House for the use of the members. The purpose is to supply these books for the use of members during the sessions of Congress.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RETIREMENT OF NAVY OFFICERS.

The Committee on Naval Affairs was called.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 339) authorizing the voluntary retirement of certain officers of the United States Navy who have rendered conspicuous services in battle or who have served thirty years in the Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act any officer of the Navy, of the line or staff, or any person holding rank as such by law and borne upon the Navy Register, who has been conspicuous in battle, or who has served the Government faithfully and honorably for thirty years, may be placed on the retired-list of the Navy, with the rank and retired pay of the next higher grade; but no officer shall be retired under this act except on his own application.

SEC. 2. That any officer wishing to be retired under this act shall make a written application to that effect to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall thereupon appoint a board of not less than five officers, superior in rank to the applicant, to determine whether he is entitled to the benefit thereof.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. BALLENTINE) was read, as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 339) authorizing the voluntary retirement of certain officers of the United States Navy who have served thirty years in the Navy, or who have rendered conspicuous services in battle, beg leave to state that they have had the matter under consideration, and find that this bill was fully considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Forty-eighth Congress, and favorably reported by them to the House. After a thorough examination of that report we recommend its adoption and the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 824, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The committee have examined carefully into the matter of this bill, and believe that such a measure of relief for officers of the Navy is just to them and greatly needed.

There are a number of officers in the Navy of the lower grades who receive no advancement for years, and who are not benefited by the retirement law, and are continued in the service after attaining the age of sixty-two years. Many of these officers are volunteers, who were selected to remain in the Navy at the close of the civil war, and who had performed gallant and meritorious service. Some of them have already attained (or nearly so) the age prescribed for retirement, having entered the service late in life, yet they receive no benefit by the present retiring law, which requires forty years' service. The provisions of this act include what are known as forward officers, boatswains, gunners, carpenters, sailmakers, &c., who, under the present law, have no advancement from the time they receive their appointments until death, although it can not be questioned that their services are as hard, dangerous, and gallant, as a rule, as any other class. There is also a class of officers of the line and staff who, under existing laws, receive no benefits of retirement, who have performed as gallant and meritorious service as any other class who will be benefited by the passage of this bill.

Some of these officers were advanced in 1865 for gallantry by a board of admirals, but who since that time have lost all advantage of such advancement, the act of Congress having been set aside from time to time; and in many cases officers not recommended have superseded them in promotion. The effect of various acts of Congress looking to a reduction of the Navy has been to bar from promotion the next higher grade, except in a few cases, to about seven years. This is not only disheartening to these officers, but manifestly unjust.

The committee think the provisions of the bill do a long-deferred justice to officers of the Navy, which has been extended to the Army, and we recommend the adoption of this report and the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. The classes of cases covered by this bill are described so carefully and fully by the report made by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BALLENTINE], that it scarcely seems necessary or possible to add further explanation.

The Navy Register has upon it quite a number of officers who under the law can not be promoted; in fact, they cannot be advanced at all. They came into the service during the war of the rebellion and have been continued on the Navy Register from that time until now. Many of them have been in the service for thirty years. Many of them performed conspicuous acts of gallantry during the war; and yet, under the law for the reduction or reorganization of the Navy, these men are allowed no promotion whatever, and have to-day the same rank and the same pay they had many years ago.

This bill will benefit that class of officers and will enable them to retire from a service in which they are no longer needed. By reason of age and hardships undergone in the past they are no longer able to perform the duties which should be performed by officers holding their rank. This bill applies to another class of officers, some of whom occupy high positions in the Navy, officers who have held their positions for a long time, and who by reason of lack of qualifications or some other unhappy circumstance are regarded by the Department as unfit to take command of either ships or squadrons. There are many instances where officers have been kept "on leave" or "waiting orders" for many years because the Department was not willing to trust them with the command of a ship or a squadron. Their conduct is such that charges can not be preferred against them; they can not be tried by court-martial and the service freed from them in that way; and they hang on and on and on, blocking promotion, and yet rendering no service to the country.

It is for the purpose of giving such officers as I have described an opportunity to get out of the way of the competent and progressive men—the bright, intelligent, active element of the service, the useful and effective officers of the Navy—that this bill is presented to the House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Do you propose to retire those officers also with the advanced rank—to put worthless men on the retired-list on do-nothing pay?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, we shall find it cheaper to allow these officers two-thirds pay on the retired-list than full pay on the active-list. We want men on the active-list who are able to discharge the duties of their positions, and this bill proposes the only means by which we can get rid of what has been called time and time again the "dead wood" of the service.

Mr. PETERS. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] simply proposes to put a premium on incapacity?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I can not allow the gentleman to put any such words into my mouth. The committee simply furnish in this bill the only sensible means of putting life into the official personnel of the Navy by getting rid of a number of these worn-out officers; for I do not wish to be understood as saying that all of them, or even that any very great number of them, come within the description I have given. Most of them are old men, who have been in the service for more than thirty years, who have shown conspicuous activity and gallantry in the past, but who have now got beyond that time of life where they care to remain longer on the active-list, and who are willing to "step down and out," to go upon the retired-list, and give an opportunity for that healthy promotion which experience has shown to be the best means of promoting the efficiency of all military and naval organizations. This bill has been thoroughly considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the present House, as it was also earnestly and carefully considered by the committee of the last House; in each instance it met with the approval of every member of the committee, and in both instances it was unanimously reported. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to add to what has been already said.

The committee have sought diligently and members of the House have sought earnestly to discover the best means of breaking up what is known as the block in promotion among the officers of the Navy, and have agreed to recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. In a moment. The committee, I say, have sought to find some means of getting rid of what has come to be known in the language of the day as the "dead wood" in the personnel of the Navy. It was proposed and thought for a while that there might be some bill passed providing for a method of selection, a means by which there might be selected out of the whole body of officers those who should be promoted, but a trial of that plan has shown how utterly impracticable it is; has shown that it raises innumerable jealousies and heart-burnings and trouble of all kinds, and can not be practically carried out. So as we can not select in, the committee think the next best thing is to select out, and this bill furnishes the means of doing that.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, what I desire to ask the gentleman is whether the committee have come to any conclusion as to the number of officers that this bill will apply to.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I have no certain means of knowing that, Mr. Speaker, but I understand that there are some thirty or forty officers who come within the provisions of the bill and will gladly go upon the retired-list.

Mr. KING. Have not the committee made an investigation on that point?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I was not a member of the subcommittee that had the matter in charge. I do not remember the exact number, but I have understood that there will probably be thirty or forty officers who will take advantage of such a law, and that would effect a saving of at least one-third of the salaries now paid to those officers on the active-list.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does the gentleman say this would be a saving of a third of the salaries now paid to these men?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does not this bill place on the retired-list those who are now in the service; and would not others be put in their places and draw the same salary?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. No, sir. Quite a number would be benefited by this bill where there is no promotion.

Mr. MCMILLIN. No promotion? Then how is it these men get out of anybody's way, as the gentleman said in a previous part of his speech?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. That remark applies to cases where they do get out of somebody's way.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then where they do get out of somebody's way somebody will take their places; and instead of there being a saving to the Government, there will be an additional expense to that extent, will there not?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I think not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish the gentleman would explain to the House how that is.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I shall be very glad to do so. If these objectionable members of the official personnel of the Navy, who are supposed to be wholly worthless, step out and give place to men who are able to discharge their duties and earn the money that they receive it will be a real advantage, for we shall get something for something, instead of getting nothing for something.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If these officers are really incapacitated for performing duty as such, is there not a way now for retiring them——

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And does not this bill propose to retire those who are not incapacitated to perform the duties pertaining to their offices?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, there are in actual life many men—at least we have some conspicuous examples of that kind—of whom nothing on earth can be said except that they are generally worthless. A man may have no vices that can be assailed; he may not drink or gamble; he may not do anything; in other words, he may simply maintain a useless respectability; and such a man can not be used for the purposes for which the Government pays him. Now, men of that kind can not be put on the retired-list, because they do not come within the provisions of the existing law. A man may be physically strong, may be morally pure; but if he is intellectually weak he does not happen to be covered by the law of retirement.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the gentleman mean to say that officers who are mentally weak have gained their way to these high positions?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will suspend their remarks until order is restored. Members will resume their seats and stop conversation.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I shall be very glad to answer any question.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. REAGAN. What change does this bill make in the present law for the retirement of naval officers?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. It authorizes voluntary retirement, whereas under the law as it stands to-day men can not retire voluntarily until they have reached the age of sixty-two years or are physically or mentally incapacitated, as shown by examination when they come up for promotion.

Mr. REAGAN. Does this bill authorize these men, at any period of service, voluntarily to retire?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. No, sir; only after they have served thirty years or have performed some conspicuous act of gallantry which has been recognized; and the bill provides that there shall be a thorough investigation to determine whether the person proposing to retire comes within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that he does not follow exactly the bill in his remarks setting forth its provisions.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I shall be very glad if the gentleman from Tennessee will show the discrepancy.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The provision of the bill is that a man shall be retired when he has been "conspicuous in battle," not when he has rendered some conspicuously gallant service, as was stated by the gentleman from Illinois a few moments ago. Why, sir, when did a man ever run away on the field of battle without making himself "conspicuous" to those who were around him? [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I do not care to answer that, inasmuch as this bill does not apply to this class of men.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does not apply to that class? Why, the language of the bill makes it apply.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. The bill provides, if the gentleman will examine it, that only those who legitimately come within its provisions can be retired.

Mr. BEACH. I would like to inquire of my friend from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] whether the committee of which he is a member considered the propriety of including within the provisions of this bill the ordinary seamen? Why should it be confined to officers of the Navy? Why should not the ordinary seamen, who have performed thirty years' service in the Navy, be allowed the same privilege of going upon the retired-list as the officers of the Navy?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Why do you not allow the private soldiers of the Army to go upon the retired-list?

Mr. BEACH. We do. Under the bill which I introduced in the last Congress, and which was passed, an enlisted man in the Army, after thirty years' service, has the right to go upon the retired-list, and I do not see any reason why a sailor should not have the same right in this regard that a soldier has.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. There are some reasons which suggest themselves to my mind at once against the proposition of the gentleman, but I will frankly say to him that the case of the ordinary seaman was not considered by the committee, for the reason, in the first place, that the bill contained no provision applicable to them, nor do the ordinary seamen have command of ships, nor are they charged with responsibility for a million dollars' worth of property or two or three hundred lives, as officers are. Therefore, there is no danger of their getting in the way or failing to discharge their duties properly. There is a pension-list upon which disabled seamen may be put; there are sailors' homes where they can be sent after they have performed certain service and reached a certain age.

But, Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced for the purpose of relieving the present stagnant condition of the Navy. It was for the purpose of putting into the service or bringing to the front some active intelligent men who have received the advantages of modern education, who are abreast of the times in the matter of ships and guns and other appliances of modern naval warfare. We want just such material there, and in order to get it or to retain it it is necessary we should start the tide of promotion. Then our very best men in the naval service will not become disgusted after having been ensigns for twelve, fourteen, or sixteen years without any hope of promotion and leave and go out into civil life.

Why, sir, we are now losing the very best men in the naval service out of the lieutenants' list of the Navy, men capable of going anywhere and performing any duty, of making any survey, topographical or otherwise, of performing any duty that a naval officer may be called upon to perform. And yet there are men there who have been lieutenants ten and fifteen years without any hope of promotion for years and years to come. The result is, as I have already stated, that the Government is losing its very best men. They are leaving the Navy and going into civil life. They are turning their backs upon the service, which promises no promotion, no reward. It is time, therefore, we should take some action for the purpose of retaining the very best elements of the Navy, and in order to reach that end it is necessary in some way to get rid of the very worst element.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. DUNHAM. Why not change the title of the bill so it will read, "A bill to get rid of the drift-wood of the Navy." [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Because that would not be a proper title for the bill, as it furnishes the opportunity for many gallant men whose services have been honorable and valuable to the Government to retire from active service.

Mr. BEACH. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BEACH. I understand my friend from Illinois to say that he is willing to vote pensions and to give pay, and high pay, to officers, but he is not willing to vote pensions for sailors.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. No, you do not understand me to say anything of that kind, and I do not wish the gentleman to put any such expression into my mouth.

Mr. BEACH. Will you accept an amendment which I will offer to the bill to include sailors?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. It is time to bid the devil good morning when we meet him. [Laughter.] I am ready to answer that question when it comes up and when good and sufficient reasons are offered why this bill, which has only good as its object, shall be trammeled by another which has no special good in it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has occupied seventeen minutes of his time.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have not had time to look up the law which defines the terms upon which naval officers may go upon the retired-list. I trust, however, in a brief debate like this, this House will not take the step sought by the passage of the pending bill.

The establishment of a retired-list is contrary to the whole spirit and genius of our Government. The first step in that direction was a brief law in behalf of the members of the Judiciary, then one in favor of the officers of the Army, and next of one in favor of the officers of the Navy, and then one for officers of the marine service. And in the last Congress there were twelve or fifteen bills before the House for putting on the retired-list other classes of men, of the revenue marine service, of the railway postal service, and, I believe, the employés of the general postal service of the country. Many other classes were to be provided for, so as to create an aristocracy—an American aristocracy—to be fed and clothed and to live on the labor of other men.

The English Government, Mr. Speaker, where the policy is to uphold a privileged class at the expense of the masses of the people, to pay extraordinary high salaries, and to bestow rank, whether service be performed or not, do all these things, because it is a part of their political system. There they build up a privileged class to live on the toil of other people, but in this country, sir——

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REAGAN. I will.

Mr. STEELE. Do you think an officer who has given the whole of his life to the service of his country should be deprived of the support of the Government in his old age. Would you call such men aristocrats?

Mr. REAGAN. I have heard that very often, and I will answer the gentleman by saying that there are millions of men in this country who are unable to get these high offices and unable to secure these high salaries——

Several members rose.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me go on in my own way. Men, sir, who have raised respectable families, who are compelled to toil in old age, day and night almost, to support those families, to keep bread in the mouths of their children and clothes on their back—and who helps them? You make no proposition to help them, but you do propose to tax them still more that others more fortunate than they, who have risen to high offices and received bounties from the Government for years, who have had social and political advantages they never have possessed—that these men shall be still billeted upon the masses of the people and erected into a special privileged aristocratic class. I am against it. It is un-American. It is against the whole spirit and genius of our free Government.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me go on. I will answer the gentleman fully.

When our Government was organized it was organized upon the idea that its people were sovereign, that its officers were their servants, that their salaries were to be the amounts stipulated, and that their duties were to be the duties prescribed by the Constitution and laws. They were to be paid their salaries for their duties, as we would hire and pay any other man to perform duties for a given time at a given price, and they were to be employed during the time that their services were needed.

That was the theory of our Government in its organization. When they were out of service they were to be treated like all other men of this free Republic of equal rights to all and exclusive privileges to none. They were to depend upon themselves. They were to be permitted to earn their own living by their own labor, and not to be permitted to subsist upon the Treasury as a tax upon the people.

Already the law is that these naval officers may be retired from active service after they have served to an age when it is presumed they have become superannuated, and the Government makes provision to take care of them. But as I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS], under the provisions of this bill they need not grow old or become superannuated in the service in order to accomplish the purpose that the bill seems to have in view. They can get out and on the retired-list in an easier way than that. No act of the Government is necessary, if their will is in that direction, as at any time they may be retired on pay for the balance of their natural lives.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. REAGAN. If I have misstated anything in reference to your position and the effect of the bill, I will yield for an interruption.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Does not the gentleman from Texas know that it is not possible for a man to become an officer in the Navy until he has reached the age of twenty-one years?

Mr. REAGAN. What has that to do with it?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Why this: he must have been an officer in the service for more than thirty years, which would make him at least fifty-one years of age to allow him to retire, as the gentleman says, "at any time." He must have given thirty or thirty-five years of his life to the service.

Mr. REAGAN. I may have misunderstood the gentleman in that respect; but suppose he is fifty-one years of age, what of that? Does that disqualify him from service? Why, the gentleman himself is not far from fifty-one——

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Not by a good many years.

Mr. REAGAN. Well, I have been fifty-one for a good many years, and there is a good deal of good service in me yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Texas permit me to interrupt him to say that the gentleman from Illinois, I repeat, does not state correctly the provisions of this bill? I have examined it carefully, and it does not require that an officer shall have been thirty years in the service of the Government to entitle him to be retired. There is one class that may be retired at any time for any conspicuous act in battle.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. And the gentleman knows that there has not been a battle in this country for twenty-one years in which an officer could have become conspicuous. Therefore before he could be retired under the provisions of this bill he must be at least fifty years old.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But if he has been conspicuous in a single battle any time under the provisions of this bill he can retire?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. But we have not had a battle, I say, for twenty-one years.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do you suppose that this will apply only to the men now in active service? This is a provision of law which will apply to the Navy for all time to come. Does the gentleman assume that this country will always be at peace?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I hope so.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman seems to anticipate that happy condition of affairs.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. If that happy condition of affairs shall be realized in this country, certainly no one will be more delighted than I.

Mr. REAGAN. Under the existing law a man who has been in service until he is incapacitated from duty can now be retired. This bill is intended to enable him to retire before he is superannuated or unfit for active service. He need not do anything whatever to entitle him to this provision and take his place among the American aristocracy. Not only that, but it provides that when he is retired his rank shall be increased one grade above what his services entitled him to. If he is a captain he goes to the next grade above, drawing pay for that rank—a rank superior to any which he held in the service. I ask, is this just and reasonable? Will you pass such a bill as this?

What I desire to call attention particularly to is this (and I do not know the number of bills before this House, I did know the number before the last Congress in favor of this class that go upon the retired-list), but I want to repeat that these men have simply been officers because they have been more fortunate than the great masses of their fellow-citizens. They have drawn liberal salaries that others could not draw, and they have been permitted to draw them for years. They have had special privileges which others less fortunate have not had. Because the Government, therefore, had given to them positions which others could not reach, because it paid them large salaries, because they have been enabled out of their salaries in many instances to save and become rich, because it gave them social and political position, and because they had special privileges not accorded to others, is that a reason why we shall be called upon to ennoble them, and why this House is willing to make that particular class a specially favored branch of the American aristocracy?

I call attention, Mr. Speaker, to another fact in connection with this that ought to be looked to by the Military and Naval Committees. It is this: That during and after the close of the recent civil war when the money of this country was greatly depreciated, when the country felt proud of its Army and Navy and the services they had rendered and gave them everything they asked, the pay of the officers of the Army and the pay of the officers of the Navy was inordinately increased beyond all proportion to the pay allowed to other officers in other branches of the service of the Government. And there is to be no reduction. We are to retire them upon this exaggerated pay when to-day we know that $100 in money would buy more than $200 or $300 would have bought when these great increases in pay were made. Yet with the increased value of money and the increased rate of pay they are not content, but must have the privilege of retiring before being superannuated and so as to be paid for a rank they never held and a service they never performed.

I regret the bill has been sprung upon the House in this way when there was no time for its fair and judicious consideration. And I hope the House will not pass it until members have time to look into it and investigate it.

We have certainly gone far enough in the dangerous road of establishing an aristocracy in this country. The best service that Congress can render to the American people is to get back to the early-time doctrines and practices of this Government—to get back to where all men are equal before the law, where exclusive privileges are granted to none, and where we not only do not cultivate an aristocracy, but scorn and denounce it.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. What would you do with the present retired-list of the Army and Navy? Is it not amenable to the same objection that you have now been stating?

Mr. REAGAN. It certainly is. And if the gentleman desires to know what I would do I will tell him. I would repeal these un-American and aristocratic laws and let these men work for their living as other people do. I would have no aristocracy here, no privileged classes, no men who live upon the labor and toil and sweat of other men in a country claiming to be a free constitutional republic.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. What will you do with the law authorizing the retirement of judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. REAGAN. I would treat them in the same way.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman another question: Has any such measure as he indicates been proposed by himself or by others on his side holding like views with him?

Mr. REAGAN. If I can only succeed in any measure in arresting this evil by preventing others being added to the list I will congratulate the gentleman and myself that I have done something for my country even if I can not secure the repeal of the laws establishing an American aristocracy.

Mr. STEELE. I am glad we will have one vote at least against the Fitz-John Porter bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. I am of the opinion that Fitz-John Porter ought to be restored to his rank in the Army. While I respect him very much, as I have high respect for many persons now on the retired-list and liable hereafter to be placed upon it, I wish that neither he nor they should draw pay for services not rendered or be supported by the labor of other people.

Mr. McMILLIN. In the Forty-seventh Congress a bill was introduced, put upon its passage, carried through this House and through the Senate, and received the Presidential sanction, for the purpose of increasing the retired-list of the Navy. The excuse given for that legislation was that there were a large number of officers who stood in the way of the promotion of others that it was necessary to get rid of; a class of officers who were not well adapted to the service and the getting rid of whom was essential to the efficiency of the Navy. I believed then that that bill was radically wrong in its provisions; for it provided for the taking of men out of the naval service after the Government had educated them and supported them for years and when they were in the very prime of life, if they had not attained certain grades. Its provisions I will not take the time of the House to recount.

I believe that we went then to the very end of the tether we ought ever to reach on the subject of retirement. But what do we see before us to-day? A provision to extend the retired-list. I concur fully in what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has said concerning the impolicy in our form of government of extending the retired-list both for military and civil life; and he will prove himself a benefactor who assists in arresting this disposition to increase the retired-list.

Why, sir, what reason is given us by the author of the bill, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS], for its passage? He says it is the only sensible way to rehabilitate the Navy, to reanimate that institution. The only sensible way! And why? He says that these officers ought to be retired because they are "dead wood." This is his patent for getting rid of "dead wood" in the Navy. And how? Not by assembling a court-martial and turning them out for misconduct or inefficiency; not by retiring them with the rank they then held, but by promotion, holding up the tempting bait of retired salary until it reaches that colossal height that what he denominates "dead wood" is willing to accept it and go out of the service voluntarily. He proposes to hire them by a rank never attainable by them by service to step out of the way.

Is this House ready to yield to such an argument? Is this body ready to adopt such a method of getting rid of the inefficient naval officers? I think not.

Mr. LAIRD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. LAIRD. What is the colossal salary of a lieutenant of the Navy on the retired-list?

Mr. McMILLIN. Any salary is "colossal" if he who gets it is a bit of "dead wood." [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS], says that there are good men in the service who have not been promoted for years by reason of the inefficient men who stand in front of them. Is this the way we should adopt to get rid of those inefficient men? What will be the effect of this bill if it is passed? If such an officer as the gentleman has described is inefficient, if he is "dead wood" in his present position, he probably can not do as well in private life; and, inasmuch as this is not to be a forced retirement, but a voluntary one, he will not accept it, but remain on his full pay.

No man respects a faithful public servant more than I do; no man will more cheerfully vote him reasonable compensation; no man will give him more readily any measure of justice to which his services entitle him; no man is more ready than I am to apply whatever just method is necessary to restore our Navy; but I insist, sir, that it can never be done by any such method as this. Let it be understood that a man's promotion in the Navy, as in every other department of the public service, is to depend on his efficiency. When you do that you will offer the highest inducement that can be held out for efficiency in the service.

What more, Mr. Speaker, does this bill provide? Not simply that the men who may be retired under it shall have served thirty years. If that were the provision there might be some excuse for it on the ground of longevity service. But the bill provides, sir, that if a man has rendered himself conspicuous in any one battle, no matter if he has only been in the service for ten days, he may go upon the retired-list with a rank he never held, and draw the salary through life. Is the House ready to vote for such a law as that?

Are you ready to say that because a man has acted as a pilot in some naval engagement, or has rendered some special service at some particular time, he shall have a right to retire, under the provisions of this bill, from the service of the Government that has educated him and has had reasonable ground to expect that it would receive all the service he could render? Mind you, the bill does not couple the two provisions as to retirement with the word "and," but with the word "or;" so that if an officer has either been in the service for the length of time named, or has rendered himself "conspicuous" in battle, he may be retired on his own petition.

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that this bill ought not to pass. And, aside from the special considerations which apply to it, I do not believe that it is good public policy to increase the retired-list of the Navy or of any other branch of the public service. I believe that in this free, happy America American manhood will be best sustained and American spirit best fostered by letting it be understood by every one in the public service that there is to be no aristocracy here, and no distinction save that which comes from intelligence, integrity, and faithful performance of duty. When you set up that standard you foster the spirit which is the foundation of all navies, all armies, and all governments, and you take the best means of perpetuating American institutions. Sir, you can never do it by paying salaries never earned or bestowing rank not deserved! No, sir; never!

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] desires to reply to what has been said in opposition to the bill I yield the floor to him; but I give notice that after he shall have spoken I shall ask the House to vote upon the bill.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I desire, if I can resume the floor, to yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, I am as much opposed to the growing "aristocracy," "anglomania," and "snobocracy," as it is called, in the United States as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] or the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN]. If my professions have not been so loudly made as those of some other gentlemen on this floor, it is not because my convictions are not as deep and intense as theirs.

Now, this bill, it seemed to me in the committee, and after all that has been said by the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Tennessee it still seems to me, is a bill for reform and retrenchment in the Navy. We are not discussing the question whether we shall abolish the Army or the Navy because they are aristocratic institutions. We are not here, so far as this bill is concerned, to inveigh against the Navy or the regular Army. It has been the policy of this Government from its foundation to maintain a small but efficient regular army. It has likewise been the policy of Congress from the time the Republic was formed to this day to maintain a small but efficient navy. And so long as these are the settled institutions of the country, so long as the Congress of the United States annually appropriates a large sum to maintain them, let us do everything to make them efficient. And this bill is in the interest of an efficient administration of this branch of the public service.

Now, the personnel of the Official Register of the Navy may be divided into two classes. There is, first, that list of old and gallant officers who manned our Navy in the civil war and in the war with Mexico; yes, and going back to the war of 1812. They belong to the past. They belong to the old school who walked the quarter-deck at Trafalgar and Lake Erie in cocked hats and waving feathers, flashing their broadswords in the sun as they led their men to repel boarders. They are not up to the times of a modern navy. The modern officer fights behind sixteen inches of compound armor with hundred-ton guns, and does or dies in less than an hour. The young men who are to-day educated and graduated at our school at Annapolis are, in scientific proficiency, in professional skill, and in power to conduct a modern naval battle far in advance of those old veterans. Yet, although in that sense those old men are "dead wood," there is no legal and regular means of taking them off the register. Nothing but death or act of Congress can remove them. What does my distinguished colleague on the Naval Committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS], mean when he says that they are "dead wood?" He does not mean that they are drunkards; he does not mean that they are physically incapacitated; he does not mean that their deficiency is of a kind which an official examination would determine. He simply means that they belong to a past period in naval affairs and that their inability is of a subtle kind, undeterminable by official inquisition, and no naval board of examination, taking these men mentally or physically, could find a reason for relegating to obscurity and to the retired-list these old men of the Navy.

Now, we want a law whereby these men, battle-scarred as they are at the hands of the enemies of this Republic, may be honorably retired, so that we may place the new navy, which the people of these United States demand that Congress shall build, in the hands of the young scientifically trained men of the age of iron, not wooden ships, and such as the present age graduates from the school that we maintain at such expense.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Before the gentleman concludes his remarks I would like to ask him, if he will yield——

Mr. MCADOO. I will yield.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. How much better he thinks the school at Annapolis is for educating men for the Navy than the school of the Navy itself. He speaks of these men who have been in service for thirty or forty years, who have "walked the quarter-deck," who have been in naval battles, and are "battle-scarred," and he wants to put these men aside for students from the Naval Academy!

Mr. MCADOO. Certainly; that is just the point. I thank my friend for his question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman seems to think that men can be better educated for the Navy in an artificial school than in the real school of war.

Mr. MCADOO. Modern naval battles are not fought as we have seen them represented in the pictures in our school histories. That is the trouble. These old men, some of them—and this does not apply to all—could not conduct a modern naval battle according to the science of war as now understood. They are good sailors, but not fighters of iron ships.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Are such battles fought at Annapolis?

Mr. MCADOO. The education given at Annapolis is practical——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of reports from committees has expired. When the House resumes the consideration of this subject the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], having occupied five minutes, will be entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes more.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ELECTION CONTEST—CAMPBELL VS. WEAVER.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting certain papers in the contested-election case of Campbell vs. Weaver, from the sixth Congressional district of Iowa; which were referred to the Committee on Elections.

The motion of Mr. HAMMOND was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, relative to the establishment by the United States Government of military posts on the southwestern frontier of Kansas to insure protection against Indian depredations. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas desire to have the resolution read?

Mr. INGALLS. It may be printed, as is usual, in the RECORD, without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken if there be no objection.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 4.

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring therein), That our Senators and Members of Congress be, and are hereby, requested to use their utmost endeavors to secure the establishment by the United States Government, on the southwestern frontier of Kansas, of not less than two military posts, sufficiently garrisoned with troops, to insure protection to the citizens of the southwestern portion of the State.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to each of our Senators and Members of Congress.

STATE OF KANSAS, Office of the Secretary of State.

I, E. B. Allen, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution, now on file in my office, adopted by the senate on the 21st day of January, A. D. 1886, and concurred in by the house of representatives on January 21, A. D. 1886.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Topeka, this the 22d day of January, A. D. 1886.

[SEAL.] E. B. ALLEN, Secretary of State.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present resolutions in the nature of a petition to Congress praying for the enactment of a law excluding from the mail newspapers and other publications containing lottery advertisements, adopted at a meeting of the preachers of the Methodist Episcopal churches in Philadelphia, Pa., and I present also a similar petition from the Ministerial Association of Pottsville, Pa.

Inasmuch as that subject has been reported upon by the committee, I move that the petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented resolutions adopted by the third national cattle convention, held in Chicago, Ill., in November last, favoring additional legislation and appropriations to prevent the introduction and spread of contagious diseases among cattle; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PLUMB presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 4.

Whereas General Sheridan, commander-in-chief of the Army of the United States, has recommended the enlargement of Fort Riley, with a view of establishing at said post a school for the training of the cavalry and light artillery arms of the service and other improvements for the utilization of the large reservation at said military post; and

Whereas said post and military reservation is well adapted to the uses thus proposed; and

Whereas said improvements will redound to the general good of the people of Kansas: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That our Representatives in Congress are hereby requested and our Senators instructed to use their best endeavors to secure such an appropriation by Congress as will fully carry out the purpose of the commanding general, making Fort Riley an important military post.

STATE OF KANSAS, Office of the Secretary of State.

I, E. B. Allen, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution now on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Topeka, this the 22d day of January, A. D. 1886.

[SEAL.] E. B. ALLEN, Secretary of State.

Mr. PLUMB presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, favoring the establishment of military posts for the protection of the southern frontier of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Henry Faxon and 60 other citizens of Massachusetts, praying for an amendment to the Constitution securing female suffrage; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the petition of W. H. Gardner, of Mobile, Ala., president of the Cotton Exchange; James L. McLean, of New Orleans, La., president of a like body in that city, and William P. Campbell, of New York, respecting the Signal Service. I move its reference to the joint committee to consider the present organization of the Signal Service, Geological Survey, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department, who are now considering that subject. The chairman of the joint committee is the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred accordingly if there be no objection.

Mr. ALDRICH presented resolutions adopted at the ninth annual meeting of the Music Teachers' National Association held in the Academy of Music, New York city, in 1885, favoring the enactment of a national copyright law; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CHACE presented the petition of Charles Lockwood and others, praying for the repeal of the law authorizing the coinage of the silver dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EVARTS presented a petition of 807 merchants and business men of New York, praying for the suspension of silver coinage; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPOONER presented a petition of the board of supervisors of Saint Croix County, Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of a law providing that railroads shall not charge more for a shorter distance than for a longer distance; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation by Railroad between the several States.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of Typographical Union, No. 77, of Erie, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of the bill now pending before the Senate for the establishment of an international copyright; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. TELLER presented the petition of J. D. Hooper, H. B. Gillespie, and other citizens of Colorado, praying for the free and unlimited coinage of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I present a petition for the increase of the pension now allowed Mrs. Louise Craven, widow of Commander T. A. M. Craven. I call attention to the fact that it is signed by Admiral Porter and all the rear-admirals of the Navy of United States. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1185) to amend that portion of section 1556 of the Revised Statutes regulating the pay of clerks to commandants of navy-yards, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 353) for the relief of J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 936) for the relief of John M. McClintock, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 725) for the relief of Maj. G. W. Candee, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 829) to facilitate promotions throughout the Army by retiring from active service, upon their own application, officers of the Army who served in the war of the rebellion, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 99) to determine the rights of William Wheeler Hubbell and the United States respectively therein stated, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1136) additional to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," passed June 3, 1864, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HAWLEY. A memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, asking for the construction of suitable defenses for New York Harbor, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The committee judges that it belongs to the new Committee on Coast Defenses, and therefore asks to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred accordingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change of reference will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 528) for the relief of William H. Morgan, submitted an adverse report thereon, and moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. INGALLS. From what committee was the bill for the relief of William H. Morgan reported just now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. The name sounds familiar. If I am not mistaken I introduced the bill myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was introduced by the Senator's colleague [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that that bill be placed upon the Calendar. If it is the bill I think it is, it has been reported once or twice favorably by the Military Committee and passed at least once by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee if there be no objection.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 266) for the relief of L. Madison Day, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 952) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the Citizens' National Bank of Louisville, Ky.; and

A bill (S. 30) for the relief of Harry I. Todd, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 53) for the relief of the Mission Indians in the State of California, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 753) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

DAKOTA TERRITORY.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], authorizing the printing of 5,000 copies of the report of the Committee on Territories on the bill providing for the admission of the State of Dakota, to report the same favorably without amendment. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That there be printed 5,000 extra copies of the report of the Committee on Territories accompanying the Senate bill to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1254) amending section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, fixing the compensation of inspectors of hulls and boilers in the several districts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STANFORD introduced a bill (S. 1255) to authorize the purchase of a site for a building for a post-office, court-house, and other offices in San Francisco, Cal.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1256) for the relief of Thomas H. Norton and James McLean; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1257) granting a pension to Henry Shively; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1258) for the relief of Mary A. Lewis, widow of Joseph N. Lewis; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1259) granting a pension to Samuel A. J. Malicoat; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1260) for the relief of Durant H. L. Bell; which was read twice by its title, aud referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 1261) to amend section 533 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1262) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1263) for the relief of Richard T. Bryan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1264) to provide for the purchase of the two improved water ways known as the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal and the Lake Superior Ship-canal Railway and Iron Company Canal, being the improved harbors of refuge and the water communication across Keweenaw Point, from Keweenaw Bay to Lake Superior, by way of Portage River and Lake, in the State of Michigan, and to make the same a free passage-way and harbors of refuge to commerce and navigation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. Some days since I introduced a bill to establish a national university, which was read a first time, and at my request laid upon the table. I ask that the bill be taken from the table, read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The bill (S. 846) to establish a national university was read the second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the heirs of Michael O'Brien be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. MAHONE, it was Ordered, That the papers touching the claim of Henry H. Sibley be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims in connection with Senate bill 909.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Hadley Hobson be withdrawn from the files and sent to the House War Claims Committee, there being no adverse report.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of D. H. L. Bell be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SEWELL, it was

Byers & Co. the right to take and use water from the Umatilla River, on the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. VEST, it was Ordered, That Senate bill No. 115, for the relief of Richard F. Barrett, be taken from the files of the Committee on Claims and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MILITARY BANDS.

Mr. PLUMB submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the number of military bands in the Army, the number of enlisted men and civilians respectively of which composed, the provision of law authorizing the constitution and maintenance of the same, the cost of such maintenance, and the fund or funds from which the same is provided; and if any portion of such maintenance is from the savings from the rations of enlisted men, whether such use of said savings is legal and proper, and, if so, whether such use is the best disposition for the benefit of the enlisted men of the Army which can be made of the savings from their rations.

BUSTS FOR THE SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be directed to consider the subject of placing busts of the Vice-Presidents and the Presidents pro tempore of the Senate in the vacant niches of the Senate Chamber and its corridors, and to report by bill or otherwise.

DUPLICATE MEDALS.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire as to the expediency of procuring duplicates of all medals which may have been made at the Philadelphia Mint, to be placed in the Library of Congress, and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

STREET RAILWAY BUILDINGS.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to confer with the Architect of the Capitol, and report whether suitable buildings can be erected at the street railway stations on the public grounds east of the Capitol without detriment to the said grounds, to be used for the employés of said railways. Also to report what legislation is necessary to require the companies owning said railways to construct such buildings pursuant to the plans to be furnished by said architect.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask that the resolution may lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over.

DISTRICT BANK TAXES.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas it is alleged that the national banks in the District of Columbia have at no time since the enactment of the banking law paid local taxes in said District: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to investigate as to the above allegation, and report what legislation, if any, is necessary to require the payment of taxes by said corporations.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask that the resolution may lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over until to-morrow.

LAND GRANTS IN OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. On the 19th of this month I submitted a resolution relating to an inquiry into certain land grants in the State of Oregon. The resolution was modified, upon my suggestion on the 20th instant, and placed upon the Calendar. I now ask that it be taken from the Calendar for the purpose of reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution relating to land grants in aid of military wagon-roads in the State of Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves to proceed to the consideration of this resolution with a view to its reference. If there be no objection, the resolution will be taken up and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. That order is made.

ARKANSAS HOT SPRINGS.

Mr. HARRISON. Several days ago I called up Order of Business No. 14 upon the Calendar, being a resolution in relation to certain statements in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions. At the request of my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] the resolution was laid over until Monday, but was not reached at that time. I ask that it may now be acted upon. It is not a matter that will take any time.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the consent of the Senator from Indiana to allow me to call up a resolution for reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. HARRISON. The business which I called up will not lead to any debate, but I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks the consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him relative to bath-house and hot-water privileges upon the reservation of Government lands at Hot Springs, Ark. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. BERRY. I will state that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] was of the opinion that the wording of the resolution was such that it might indefinitely prevent action, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] moved the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands. I consent to that reference, and hope it will be so referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands if there be no objection.

ALLOWANCE OF PENSION CLAIMS.

Mr. HARRISON. It will only be necessary, I think, to call up the resolution in order to dispose of it. The substitute which I offered embraces all that I proposed before, and I simply ask for its adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as it now stands. Does the Senator ask for the reading of the last substitute proposed?

Mr. HARRISON. I called my colleague's attention to the substitute. It embraces everything in the very language of the report.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes; that is what is proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Commissioner of Pensions, in his annual report dated November 18, 1885, has stated that—

"At one time the Pension Bureau was all but avowedly a political machine, filled from border to border with the uncompromising adherents of a single organization, who had for the claimant other tests than those of the law, and who required, in addition to service in the field, submission to and support of a party before pensions were granted. Not always, but often was this true; not openly, but surely were the tests applied; and the vast machinery of a professed governmental office became a party power. The enormous array of the medical boards established in every quarter was almost solidly partisan; made so not openly but surely. People of one faith filled every one of the great agencies. Examiners, trained in unscrupulous schools, traversed the land as recruiting sergeants for a party.

"Chiefs of divisions, assistants, clerks, messengers, messenger boys, watchmen, and laborers were all-but entirely from the one school. Veteran service could not secure continuance in office, and at the behest and demand of partisans beyond the office old employés were cut adrift and zealous rufflers placed in their stead; leaves of absence were granted that the active men of the party might dominate over the elections. Wholesale discharges were made for partisan ends, and a careful study of the tables 21 and 21A of this report will show how a tide of men and money was poured by this office into the sections where political struggle was progressing:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money is hereby directed to inquire into the truth of said allegation and to report the facts and testimony presented before them to the Senate. Said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer. The expenses incident upon such investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Resolved, further, That said committee be also directed to inquire into the manner in which the Pension Office has been conducted and administered by the present Commissioner of Pensions in the matter of appointments to or removals from office, and to report the facts to the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand that simply to be the last paper presented by my colleague. Am I right about that?

Mr. HARRISON. So I understand.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The substitute was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as thus amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SIOUX RESERVATION IN DAKOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business having terminated, the next order of business is the consideration of the Calendar under the eighth rule. The first business on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 52) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] is the pending question. The amendment will be read.

Mr. DAWES. Before the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is read I desire to offer another one, which I have submitted to the committee. At the end of the eighteenth section I move to add:

And the Santee normal training school may in like manner purchase for such educational or missionary work on the Santee reservation, in addition to the foregoing, in such location and quantity, not exceeding 320 acres, as shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill as additional sections the following:

SEC. —. That all persons who, between the 27th day of February, 1885, and the 17th day of April, 1885, in good faith, entered upon any part of the Great Sioux reservation lying east of the Missouri River, and known as the Crow Creek and Winnebago reservation, which by the President's proclamation of date February 27, 1885, was declared to be open to settlement, and not included in the new reservation established by section 6 of this act, and who located thereon homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims, shall, for a period of ninety days after the proclamation of the President required to be made by section 22 of this act, have a right to re-enter upon said claims and complete the same as required by law, and their said claims shall for such time have a preference over later entries; and when they shall have in other respects complied with the law regulating such entries, and, as to homestead, with the special provisions of this act, they shall be entitled to have said lands, and patents therefor shall be issued as in like cases. The money paid for pre-emption and town-site entries shall be such as are required by law in other cases, and shall be paid into the general fund provided for by this act.

SEC. —. That the President shall appoint a special agent, who shall, as soon as practicable, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, make inquiry and report to the Secretary of the Interior upon the claims for losses of all persons who in good faith, between the 27th day of February, 1885, and the 17th day of April, 1885, settled upon and made claims, under the land laws of the United States, to any of the lands in said Crow Creek and Winnebago reservation, which, by the proclamation of the President of February 27, 1885, were declared to be open for settlement, and which are included in the reservation established by section 6 of this act. Said agent shall have power to cause witnesses to come before him at some point convenient to said reservation, and to administer oaths. He shall report what improvements were made by such persons, the value of the same, the losses sustained by reason of the revocation of the executive order opening said lands to settlement, giving the particulars of any such losses, and all other facts connected therewith. And in case the consent of the Indians is not obtained, as required by section 22 of this act, then the same inquiry and report shall be made as to all persons who made claims as aforesaid upon that part of said reservation which is not included in the new reservation established by section 6 of this act, and which was by said executive order of February 27, 1885, declared to be open to settlement. The Secretary of the Interior shall transmit said report to Congress, with his recommendations thereon.

Mr. DAWES. I should think those sections should come in between section 21 and section 22. They are blank sections.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think it is material. Perhaps the order would be better at the place suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. I accept the suggestion that they come in after section 21 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be proposed to be so inserted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate by any discussion of this amendment. I will state briefly the facts out of which the necessity for this legislation grows.

President Arthur, taking the view—which I do not for present purposes care to discuss as to whether it was the right view or the wrong view—that the Crow Creek and Winnebago reservation on the east side of the Missouri River was a reservation that existed by executive order only, and was not embraced within the provisions of the Sioux treaty of 1868, reduced the reservation by an executive order on the 27th of February last year, and threw open to settlement a large body of land. Under the invitation of that proclamation a large number of settlers went upon the lands that were thus declared to be open under the land laws of the United States, and made town-site entries, homestead entries, pre-emption entries, and perhaps timber-culture entries, for aught I know; for there was no limitation upon their right to make any entry that was admissible under any of the land laws of the United States. Subsequently, under the advice of the present Attorney-General, Mr. Cleveland, some time early in April, reversed that order, and declared the lands not to be open to settlement. He recognized the reservation as being part of a treaty reservation, and warned the settlers off the reservation. Most of them, perhaps all of them, at one period or another between that time and this have left the reservation.

By direction of the Senate a subcommittee of the Committee on Indian Affairs visited the reservation last summer and went entirely across it from one end to the other, took testimony at Pierre and at Chamberlain also, and met the settlers, who were very much excited and aggrieved over this disaster which had come to their plans for settlement upon the reservation.

The amendment contains just two propositions. One is that where a settler in good faith under the land laws of the United States, and under the invitation of the President's proclamation of the 27th of February, went upon that land and made a settlement with a view to perfecting a pre-emption entry, or a homestead entry, or a town-site entry, if under the provisions of this bill a certain portion of these lands are ceded by the Sioux he shall be entitled to go again upon the claim which he entered and to complete his entry.

The amendment contains another proposition, which relates to lands that were thrown open by the executive proclamation and are not opened by the bill, but still retained as a part of the reservation. As to those lands it provides for the appointment of a commissioner, who, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall go there, call witnesses before him, and make an estimate and inquiry into the losses of those who have been put off the reservation and can not be allowed to resume and complete their claims by reason of the fact that this legislation still retains it as an Indian reservation.

This was the best we could suggest. It is not adequate, I agree. I had a letter the other day from a very intelligent man writing from Minneapolis, who tells me his case. Under that proclamation he went upon the land, spent three or four hundred dollars in going there and in making his little improvements and breaking the land. He left the reservation under the order of President Cleveland and returned to Minneapolis. Of course the privilege which we give to him, if his land is embraced in the first section of the amendment, to return and resume his claim is a very inadequate compensation; it does not make him whole for the money he expended in going there the first time. But I have thought that those indirect damages could hardly be compensated, and perhaps after all the most we can do for those people, with whom I sympathize very much, is to provide, as I have done in the amendment, that those who please may go back if the lands are now opened to settlement and resume their claims and have a prior right; and that those who are not allowed to exercise this option by reason of the fact that their lands are retained in the reservation shall be compensated for such losses as were incident to their attempt to make a settlement; and the commissioner is to report all these facts to Congress so that we may legislate upon it and appropriate the necessary money. I have talked with the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Arkansas who were with me upon that trip, and I believe they concur with me in the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this is not probably the appropriate time to discuss the validity of the proclamation of February 27, 1885, or the counter-proclamation of the 17th of April following, but there were some rather peculiar circumstances that attended the original proclamation to which my attention was called when visiting this country as a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Indian Affairs last summer. It appears that the arrival of the notice of the proclamation of February 27 had been awaited by the inhabitants of the country along the border of this reservation with great impatience. If I recollect aright, the evidence showed that the telegraphic announcement was made after nightfall on the 27th day of February; and in anticipation of that event the citizens of the towns along the border were encamped upon the line with their horses attached to their vehicles that were loaded with lumber and with household implements, and immediately upon the ting of the instrument they set off instantaneously like an army moving upon an intrenched position, and the operations of taking claims and building cabins and making improvements were continued during that winter's night and the following day about noon the entire reservation had been occupied and improved. These villages and houses sprang like an exhalation from the surface of the prairie.

For some reason—whether it was in accordance with law or otherwise I do not, as I said, propose to consider—on the 17th of April this proclamation was countermanded by President Cleveland. These settlers were notified to abandon this reservation, to quit and surrender their occupation of it, upon the ground that the proclamation of the 27th of February was not in accordance with law. The people on the reservation formed what they called protective and defensive associations, and they made up their minds in public meetings and in private and secret gatherings that the proclamation of the 27th of February was the valid proclamation, the one that was binding upon the Government, and that that of April 17 was not in any way whatever obligatory upon their conscience or their conduct.

We had several of the officers of these associations before us at the town of Pierre, and they advised us that in the month of July, at that time two months after the proclamation had been issued, they were upon that reservation, and that they intended to remain there in spite of the proclamation of April 17. I asked the president of one of these associations if they intended to defy that executive order, and they said they did, and that they did not regard it in any way whatever binding upon them, and that they intended to remain there, and, if necessary, to resist the effort to remove them by force.

I am entirely willing that those people who went on there under the invitation of February 27, and who quietly departed under the admonition of April 17, shall have their rights protected in any subsequent arrangement which may be made for the settlement of this reservation; but I am not willing that those people who remained on the reservation in defiance of the order of the President, and who are there to this day in defiance of that order, shall be permitted to avail themselves of their own wrong and secure pre-emption rights as homesteaders upon that reservation whenever it shall be legally opened to settlement. I do not think that is a proper encouragement to hold out to men who openly announced their purpose of defying law and making themselves the judge whether a proclamation is valid and binding or not. I shall not, with my vote, offer any such encouragement to law-breaking, and I therefore propose to amend the amendment of the Senator from Indiana by adding after the word "claims," in line 11, at the bottom of the first page, the following words:

And abandoned the same in compliance with the proclamation of April 17, 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment of Mr. HARRISON by inserting after the word "claims," in line 11, at the bottom of the first page, the following words:

And abandoned the same in compliance with the proclamation of April 17, 1885.

So as to make the clause read:

And not included in the new reservation established by section 6 of this act, and who located thereon homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims, and abandoned the same in compliance with the proclamation of April 17, 1885, &c.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I shall not attempt at this time, owing to the limit of debate and for other reasons, as well as the fact that I do not wish unnecessarily to continue the debate on this bill, to discuss the validity of either of the orders which have been named. I should think that I might without going into any discussion call the attention of the Senate briefly to the fact that a very grave question is presented when one executive officer having proceeded according to a discretion left with him to determine what the meaning of a treaty is, and having determined it, and property rights having intervened under that determination, there can be a subsequent adjudication so as to destroy those property rights.

So far as these settlers are concerned, I do not know what they did. I know that for a year the question whether this was or was not an Indian reservation under the treaty of 1868 had been a matter of discussion in the Interior Department. The people living in the village of Chamberlain and the people who desired to become settlers on this land, if it was public land, had sent early—at least a year before this first proclamation—their petitions and their briefs, made out by their attorneys, and later they had sent a distinguished ex-member of the House of Representatives as their lawyer to discuss the question before the Department. It was carefully discussed by their attorneys. They were represented also by the Delegate from that Territory, who also presented his views to the Secretary.

A brief was filed by gentlemen living in Chamberlain who were volunteers, so far as that was concerned, giving their views on the subject. Letters were written and papers were filed, and the whole question was finally resolved into a question of fact and not a question of law.

Thereupon the matter was submitted, first coming directly to the Secretary, to the law division, where it was determined; it was again submitted by the Secretary to the Indian division of the Secretary's office, and each finding being in accordance with the views of the Secretary, on the 27th of February the order was made. At least twenty days before the order was made it was thoroughly understood in the city of Washington by the Delegate and by the counsel who had appeared and addressed the Secretary in behalf of the settlers, that the determination of the office was to issue the ultimate order that was issued on the 27th of February. At least fifteen days before the order was issued the principal paper in the Northwest, the Pioneer-Press, of Saint Paul, declared, without contradiction, that the Department had determined to open this reservation to settlement.

During all this time the people who were entitled if it was public land to go upon it and make homes were awaiting the action of the Department. For at least two weeks the order lay upon the table of the Secretary of the Interior, read by the Delegate, read by his friends, read by everybody who chose to read it, and to make exception if any could be made to the lines that were to be established. There was no secrecy about it; there was no midnight telegraphing. I understand that the Delegate waited until he knew there had been appended to it the President's signature, and then he telegraphed; but they knew just as well that it would come as they did when it did come, and then these settlers moved upon the land that they supposed and had a right to suppose was a part of the public domain. Whether it was a part of the public domain or whether it was not a part of the public domain I say I will not here to-day discuss, but I will take occasion before this session closes to discuss it in full.

These people went there, right or wrong. Now, admitting that the first order was wrong, that it was without authority of law, these people, men who were seeking homes on the public lands, went there as they supposed on the highest authority that it was possible to get. There are many good lawyers who believe to-day, right or wrong, that it was not a question that could be reviewed by anybody else. They went onto the land. Hundreds of them took every dollar that they had in the world to get there. To leave it was absolute poverty, absolute want to them; and if they staid there and insisted as to this public land, as they thought it was, not needed and not used by the Indians, upon which an Indian had never put his foot except by the way of vagabond travel, that no authority existed to declare it anything else, they were driven to it by their pressing condition; and I do not think any Senator ought to say that their course was contumacious or rebellious or that they ought not to be protected even if it was admitted that there was error in the first act of the President in issuing the order of February 27, 1885. I think these people are entitled to be put in statu quo as near as possible and to use as much of the land as is now thrown into the public domain in this bill; they ought to be allowed to go on and make their titles. I say in equity and in justice the Government ought to put them if possible where they would have been but for what, if you take the most unfavorable view of it, was the mistake of the Government of the United States.

I know there is not any obligation. I understand that there is no legal obligation when the Government of the United States invites its citizens to go upon the public land where it ought not to have invited them; but I do think that a great nation like ours can look with a little degree of leniency upon people who have put their whole living in their little cabins and the fields they attempted to cultivate; and if they do not promptly respond to an executive order, if they do question the authority and the right of it, and if they do say they will stay there until there is some method by which they may obtain their titles, I do not think it becomes us to say, "You are entirely in fault, you are in fault and nobody else." If there is a fault at all in the first instance it was the fault of the Government.

I think that these people ought to be allowed a fair compensation, and I think the suggestion made on behalf of the committee by the Senator from Indiana is a wise and proper one. The facts that the committee gathered I am not familiar with. The facts of the case I think I am familiar with. As I said, not wishing to drag into this debate and into this question some extraneous matters, I shall reserve for some future occasion an opportunity to discuss the whole subject from beginning to end.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Kansas will not press his amendment to the amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana is the result of an investigation entered into, by order of the Senate, by a subcommittee of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I was not on that subcommittee myself; it was in charge of the Senator from Indiana, and I think his amendment does justice, as nearly as it can be done, to the parties involved in this conflict of orders on the part of President Arthur and President Cleveland. It would be impossible to do exact and full justice in that matter, but this comes as near to it as can be, and I hope it will be adopted.

I do not care any more than the Senator from Colorado to enter into the propriety or the legality of the late President's order of February 27, three days before the close of his administration. But it is due to the order of President Cleveland revoking that order, and to the opinion of the Attorney-General upon which it is based, that some one should call the attention of the Senate to the opinion of the Attorney-General which has been laid upon our tables in Senate Executive Document No. 1 of this session, and which may be found on page 81 of that document. I do not see how any one can read that opinion of the present Attorney-General without coming to the same conclusion he did, that the order of President Arthur was a mistake, and that in point of fact the territory thrown open by that order was held and covered by the treaty of 1868. If I may be allowed five minutes, I think I can state the case; but at the suggestion—and it is a fair suggestion—of the Senator from Colorado that if I undertake to argue the legality of that proclamation he ought to have time to answer, I shall not go into it. I care more for the passage of the bill than I do for any opportunity to argue that matter, and I will omit it.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator will allow me one moment. If the act of the President of February 27 was improper, then there can not be any question that these people ought to be compensated.

Mr. DAWES. I agree with the Senator in that particular, and therefore it is that I go for this amendment as the Senator does; but I thought that as the Senator alluded to the revocation of the order of President Arthur, which I suppose was issued as is suggested, it was proper to state the grounds upon which it was revoked. The Senator has alluded, however, to the circumstances under which it was issued, and he will not object to an allusion by me to those circumstances.

The Territory opened by that order had been treated up to the hour of issuing that proclamation, in all official transactions, as a part of the land covered by the treaty of 1868. The present bill had passed the Senate at the last Congress and was pending in the House of Representatives when the Secretary of the Interior sent to the President and to Congress his report, and in that he commended the bill to the favorable consideration of Congress and expressed the hope that it would pass. The President in his annual message commended the bill by name. It was then pending in the other branch, having passed this body. So far as the committee having it in charge are concerned, they supposed that every official and all parties acquiesced in the bill, which recognized this land as a part of the land covered by the treaty. The Delegate from Dakota was active apparently in pushing the bill which recognized it. The committee having it in charge, and I have been verbally informed the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, supposed that in good faith everybody recognizing it as a part of the treaty, all were trying to put through this bill. Without the slightest intimation from any quarter, on the 27th of February, three days before the expiration of the term of the Senator as Secretary of the Interior, this order was issued throwing open what had always in every official act on record been treated as part of this treaty reservation to settlement. Whether anybody in the Territory had undue or improper knowledge of what was to be done or not, I do not care to say. That men expected—and they may have had a right to form such conclusions as they pleased—that they expected what was to be done at this last moment, the Senator from Indiana has given ample testimony. It was done under these circumstances. The settler who went on there in good faith is not to blame for the condition of things. If there was no blame on anybody—and I am not here to charge any blame on anybody—it is perfectly consistent with good faith on the part of the then administrators of the law to come to the conclusion that their view of the force of the law was one thing and the conclusion of the present law officers is another. That is consistent with good faith in both, and that is all that is necessary for this occasion.

If the Senator shall feel it necessary to undertake to vindicate as a law argument the position that was taken before, then it will be proper to present the reply; but I assume that it was a construction of law that the law officers at that time came as honestly to as the law officers of the present time came to the conclusion to revoke it. But these settlers went on there in good faith, and so far as this amendment is concerned it applies to no others, and they have suffered hardships and have been driven off. I think it is very proper indeed that they have the first benefit under this law; and the purport of the amendment is that they shall before all others step in and take the land under this law that they would have held under the proclamation of President Arthur.

The Senator from Kansas alludes to a condition of things which I have no doubt—I am not so familiar with those matters as the Senator from Kansas must be—is quite usual, or at least not very unusual, round about public land which is expected to be opened for settlers under the pre-emption and homestead acts; but if he will turn to the document to which I have referred he will see that the Department, to some extent, is responsible for the delay and the continuance of these men upon the reservation, though not responsible at all for any association, if any exists, for defying the proclamation.

Mr. INGALLS. Has the Senator the proclamation of April 17 there?

Mr. DAWES. I have that proclamation, and the proclamation itself has all the force that the Senator claims for it, that they must go off immediately.

Mr. INGALLS. Within sixty days.

Mr. DAWES. Within sixty days. If the Senator will turn to the fortieth page of this document he will find a telegram from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the agent, in which he says:

[Telegram.]

OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., August 30, 1885.

GASMANN,
Agent, Crow Creek, Dak., via Chamberlain:

Await further instructions from me before proceeding to remove settlers referred to in telegram yesterday, or calling on military for aid.

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

The telegram of yesterday is this:

[Telegram.]

OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, August 29, 1885.

GASMANN,
Agent, Crow Creek, Dak., via Chamberlain:

Secretary has granted you authority to remove all settlers and unauthorized persons from reservation, and, if necessary, to call on commanding officer nearest military post for force sufficient to effect their removal.

Proceed at once to remove them and their effects. See office letter, 26th. Copy of authority by mail.

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

That was on the 29th of August. On the 30th he suggested to him to wait for further instructions.

Mr. INGALLS. Before removing them by the military.

Mr. DAWES. No, it does not say so. It says:

Await further instructions from me before proceeding to remove settlers referred to in telegram yesterday, or calling on military for aid.

I will show the Senator what leads me to think that to some extent the Department thought that possibly some arrangement could be made with settlers and let them remain for a further time. I will read the other——

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will observe that at the date of that telegram the sixty days prescribed in the President's proclamation had elapsed and many had departed, and these telegrams alluded to that recalcitrant band who had obstinately refused to obey the proclamation, and the purpose was to remove them by the assistance of the Army.

Mr. DAWES. Doubtless that is true. Many of them had conformed to the proclamation; some of them still lingered, and some others were recalcitrant; but I infer that there were those who lingered not because they were disposed to defy the law, but lingered there in the hope that some arrangement might be made by which they could be permitted to remain. After this telegram the Commissioner of Indian Affairs telegraphed further to the agent, on the 15th of September:

[Telegram.]

OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., September 15, 1885.

GASMANN,
Agent, Crow Creek, Dak., via Chamberlain:

What progress have you made in removing settlers from the Big Bend? This office is surprised at your silence on this subject.

Charge Indian Office.

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

Then further:

September 17—

Mr. INGALLS rose.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me to give the reasons why I think to some extent those who remained on the land did not remain in a defiant attitude. September 17 the agent replied:

Notice given to settlers in Big Bend—

That was but a part of the territory opened—

[Telegram.]

CROW CREEK, VIA CHAMBERLAIN, DAK.,
September 17, 1885.

COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.:

Notice given to settlers in Big Bend to vacate within ten days from 10th instant; shall proceed to Bend Monday next and see if order has been complied with. Am informed that settlers are leaving; intend personally to visit every settler on reservation and serve notice to vacate within twenty days. Think they will leave without interference of military. Will take at least eight days to visit settlers; will report on my return. Am I doing right?

GASMANN, Agent.

To this the Commissioner responds:

[Telegram.]

OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., September 18, 1885.

GASMANN,
Agent, Crow Creek, Dak., via Chamberlain:

Telegram 17th received. Instructions August 31 direct you to confine operations as to settlers to Big Bend country—

That is but a part of the territory thrown open—and report results before taking action as to other portions of reservation. Action as to settlers in Big Bend approved.

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

All I desire to say is that while I agree with the Senator that when a body of men go defiantly and after the proclamation assume themselves to pass judgment upon the legality of the acts of the Administration they are entitled to no equitable consideration, but must stand upon their legal rights, I think so far as the great body of these settlers are concerned that is not true. There may be a few differently disposed, and I observe in this document indications that there were a few, and I am sorry to say that their spokesman bore the title of "Reverend," who seems to me the most ambitious of anybody to have a conflict with the United States authority.

Mr. INGALLS. He belongs to the church militant.

Mr. DAWES. He belongs to the church militant without doubt. But that class is few. By what tribunal and in what manner are you going to make a distinction between them and the great body who went there in good faith and either removed themselves in compliance with the order or remained there under these shifting orders from the Interior Department? The Interior Department evidently gave them, as it gave the agent, to understand that there was something going on in the nature of negotiation here by telling them to confine the order of removal to certain localities. There was an effort to obviate the difficulties and relieve from hardship these men. And therefore while I do not controvert the soundness of the position of the Senator from Kansas, I do oppose the applicatlon of it in this case.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator before he closes allow me, in reply to his observation about the negotiations that were pending in the Interior Department and the impression that was disseminated that there was some desire on the part of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to allow these people to remain, to make a contribution to the history of this transaction by stating that by the order of the Secretary of the Interior the agent, Major Gasmann, was removed because he had been too pitiful to the settlers.

Mr. DAWES. I want to say, in response to that, that I have been struggling for several weeks to find out whether there was any foundation for that suggestion which the Senator has made; and if he has any evidence of it, if he will communicate that to the Senate it will relieve me in another branch of duty.

Mr. INGALLS. The board of commissioners of Indian affairs that have the control of the appointment of Indian agents under the religious or ecclesiastical Indian policy told me that that was the reason alleged by the Department for his removal. That is my authority, and I suppose it is sufficient, because it came from an influential source. When the Senator from Massachusetts endeavors to leave the impression upon the Senate that here was some subtle and kindly negotiation going on by the Department of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to enable those men who had refused to depart in compliance with the proclamation of April 17 to retain their hold upon that reservation under the theory that it was in some way to be finally open to settlement, I state that they proceeded to remove Major Gasmann, who was acting under those telegrams of August and September, because he had been too pitiful.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I do not mean to say that there was any subtle influence or any design on the part of the Interior Department to carry the idea to any man who was not willing to conform to that proclamation that some indulgence would be extended to him. I do not think that is properly laid at the door of the present administration of Indian affairs. I believe that so far as they encountered any such individuals or organizations they were disposed to remove them without consideration of the hardships that it would involve; but that the Interior Department desired in some way to relieve the honest settler who went on there in good faith from hardship either arising from the expenditure of his money or the sudden order of removal of him and his effects is true, I believe; and I believe that the Interior Department, instead of being criticised for such an effort as that, deserves commendation for it. If any honest settler went out under what he had a right to believe to be legal authority to locate under the land laws, and found from any reason whatever, sound or otherwise, that that proclamation was revoked, and if he could in the administration of Indian affairs be relieved in any way from the hardships in which he was involved, it was a duty devolved upon the Interior Department, and so far as it has extended its efforts for that purpose, I think it deserves commendation.

But, sir, that Major Gasmann, the Indian agent there, has been removed or suspended because after these telegrams he had been in the opinion of the Department too indulgent with the settlers, I do not believe to be the fact. I know the evidence upon which the Senator from Kansas makes that statement. I do not believe that Mr. Gasmann has been suspended for any such cause as that; but when the evidence shall come that he has been suspended for that cause, these telegrams I think will be his defense and his justification from any such charge as that. Until I have other evidence than that upon which the Senator founds his statement I shall fail to believe that he has been suspended for any such cause. I think the Department on the whole is prepared to say that Major Gasmann exercised wonderful discretion and managed that difficult case with wonderful forbearance and wisdom, saving a conflict between settlers who went on there under the first proclamation and the Indians who found themselves crowded off from the reservation by men of whose approach they had no notice until they were there in the night-time like an army with banners about to take possession of their homes and their heritage.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Are we proceeding under what is called the Anthony rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The Chair has failed to check Senators who have been indulging in debate beyond the time prescribed by the rule.

Mr. HARRISON. I think we ought to get this bill out of the way. I suggest that for the remainder of the discussion we apply the principle of the Anthony rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I supposed we were proceeding under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is so.

Mr. TELLER. I will try to keep within the five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Has not the Senator spoken to this amendment once?

Mr. TELLER. If I have, I will move another so as to be at liberty to speak again.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no use in applying the five-minute rule to this bill after it has been proceeded with as it has been. I move to take up the bill for consideration notwithstanding any objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will not press that motion.

Mr. TELLER. I am willing to speak in five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. I think we can get along.

Mr. TELLER. I think we can.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not disposed to enforce the rule against any one who really wants to speak on the bill. I only made it in the form of a suggestion. I think we can pass the bill in a little while without trouble. I think we had better not take it out of the ordinary category.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his motion?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir, if the rule is not to be enforced. [Laughter.]

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to delay the debate. I simply want to reply to what I will say, using as polite an expression as I can, are the mistaken statements of fact made by the Senator from Massachusetts, inadvertently made I have no doubt. He says that nobody had heard of this proposition to open this reservation. The files of the Interior Department are full for a year, as I have before stated, of the efforts made by the people there to open the reservation. The question was submitted to the Attorney-General's Office. The Assistant Attorney-General designated by the Attorney-General to sit in the Interior Department to decide questions of law made a written report to the Secretary of the Interior at least a month before this territory was opened, holding that it was within the power of the President to open this reservation and that it was not included in the treaty of 1868. Not only that, but the committee that came here to urge the bill now pending in the Senate were before the Secretary of the Interior, and as I before stated, the Secretary sat there as a court to hear an argument by their attorneys; and yet the Senator says that nobody had heard of it when it was as public as the doors of the office were, and there were hundreds of men who knew that that was being discussed in the Secretary's office.

The Senator says because it had been recognized in this bill as Indian country therefore the Department was precluded from acting. It is an unheard of thing that because the Senate passes a bill three times or thirty, until it becomes a law the Departments must take the Senate's construction of what is the law. I state again that this is not a question of law at all and never has been a question of law, but a question absolutely of fact and nothing else; and when the fact was settled the law made its own application, and it did not need an Attorney-General or anybody else except that it was proper to submit it to a man who was skilled in determining questions of fact, and that was what was done.

Mr. President, I do not intend to go into any defense of the Interior Department, because I am exceedingly desirous that these men who have suffered, either by the mistake of the last Administration or the mistake of the present, shall be protected. I have letters from these people who felt inasmuch as I had made the order that I ought to take some interest in them, and I said to one and all of them, "Obey the President's order; get off that reservation; appeal to Congress; and there never has been a Congress that will not respond to you when you come there and lay your case before them and state the facts, and they will give you, so far as I am concerned, proper compensation for that which is not your fault and must be the fault of some administration, either this one or the other."

I am prepared when the time comes to discuss this question upon two phases. The first is that the question of fact justified the action taken, and second, that if it was an error, nobody is permitted under the sun to review that error, and therefore it must have stood for all time. What I am interested in now is to see these men made whole as much as possible; therefore I do not want to drag in these other questions, and hence I refrain now from discussing them.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, my impression is that the adoption of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas would operate as a very great injustice to a number of deserving men who went on this reservation. I was a member of the subcommittee that visited this reservation and examined into the facts of this case; and while I heard a good deal of loose talk about defiance of the Government, while I heard statements made by presidents of organizations of the settlers that they would go back on the reservation if they were removed by military force, the statement was made in every instance I believe that they were acting under the advice of counsel, that they believed that they had vested legal rights which they derived from the proclamation of the President of the 27th of February, and that their intention was to preserve whatever legal rights they had. Beyond this I do not think there was any evidence of any intention to defy the Government except by a hot-headed man or two. There were instances of that sort, however. I remember one in a private conversation where one of these settlers said to me that he proposed to resist by any means possible, and I jocularly suggested to him that if he proposed to defy and overthrow the United States Government, I thought I could possibly furnish him with some points which would be of value to him, that I had been engaged in an experiment of that sort once myself, and found that it did not pay well, and I believed I could give him some valuable suggestions. That man before we separated said that he intended to abide by whatever was done. I do not think there was any organized intention to resist the Government any further than to retain the legal rights they believed they had acquired under the first proclamation of the President of the United States.

Then there are a number of circumstances that enter into this. There were some of these settlers who after the proclamation of the President ordering them to leave the reservation moved their families off the reservation to adjoining towns or to other places where they had resided before. They would go back once a week to the settlements made simply for the purpose of preserving whatever rights they had, believing that some steps would be taken by the United States Government to give them the benefit of what they had already done. They did not intend to defy the Government, but they did intend as far as they could in compliance with the order of the President to preserve whatever rights they thought they had acquired.

There may be a limited number of men who went upon this reservation who were absolutely defiant of the Government, but I believe if this amendment is adopted there will be nine innocent men harmed to one man who was guilty of this kind of feeling who will suffer any inconvenience from it at all. I believe that we are instructed by high authority that it is better to allow a large number of guilty men to escape than that one innocent man be punished, and I do not think that it would be wise or proper in the Senate of the United States to begin to punish ten innocent men so that they might possibly be able to get at one who was guilty of some sort of insubordination.

When I went to this reservation I went firmly impressed that there had been very great wrongs done by a number of these citizens. I had heard, as every other member of the Senate had heard, that this settlement had been made in defiance of the Government. There were charges made that there was collusion between men high in authority and individuals in that territory for the purpose of opening it to settlement and getting an advantage for certain individuals. I went to make the examination with this impression strongly upon my mind; but the result of the investigation on my part was the conclusion that there was no foundation for such a charge and that this settlement was made in honest good faith by American citizens who desired to avail themselves of homes on the public domain of the Government and intended to do it in compliance with law and not with any intention to defy the Government.

I believe, therefore, that if the Senate adopts the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas, it will result in doing great wrong to a number of good men and may possibly reach a few and a very limited number, if any, who are absolutely defiant of the Government.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the present Administration may have done right, and probably did do right, in reversing the order of the preceding administration in regard to the right of the people to go upon this territory as part of the public domain. It is very likely that the treaty which has been referred to here gave these Indians that reservation; and if that was the fact, of course the President of the United States had no right to set aside that treaty by his proclamation, but that is a debatable question and one which I believe the Senate is not disposed to go into now. But after Mr. Cleveland's proclamation had been issued I ventured to file a modest protest with the Secretary of the Interior against any executive order that should remove these people by force from that domain, taking the ground that it was the duty of the President on such an occasion as this to allow Congress to dispose of the question, or if it might be done to allow the judiciary to dispose of it. Where the executive office finds itself one day of one opinion and proclaims it and the people act upon it, and another day of another opinion and shall entirely reverse the former action, it is always right to pause until some other department can come in and relieve the Executive and the people of the difficulty which has been imposed upon them.

I regard every settler who has gone in good faith to that territory as being not merely authorized but virtually invited to go there by the proclamation of Mr. Arthur, and I do not think that I shall be able to discriminate against such men because some of them got very angry and made some, perhaps, very unfortunate remarks or speeches after they found that they were involved by the executive action in this difficulty and trouble.

I think we had better not adopt the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, but allow Congress to do that which it is now doing, make provision by which justice and equity can be done to those people who under the circumstances went upon that land. It is said that they flooded in. It is very natural that they should flood in upon the land.

It is very natural that our people in the United States who have sons and daughters growing up who want to take an interest in the public domain by homestead settlement should flock about the borders of any unopened territory and be prepared to rush in, and, as was said, to build cities and towns on these prairies that seem to have come up as an exhalation, because the general laws of the United States invite the world to come here and upon a mere declaration of intention of citizenship to take from our children their inheritance. We extend an invitation to all the world to put themselves in competition with our own people, and I can not blame our people for being very active, very enterprising in trying to get from the authorities of this country the heritage which their fathers had bestowed upon them. I shall therefore not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana an amendment to come in after the word "persons," in the first line of his amendment, so as to read:

That all persons qualified under the law to make locations and entries of land under the homestead or pre-emption or timber-culture acts.

It may be, and probably is so, that some persons have gone in there and located on this land that are not qualified.

Mr. HARRISON. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama. I had prepared myself an amendment to come in later on, inserting "not otherwise qualified to make such entry."

Mr. MORGAN. That will do.

Mr. HARRISON. Let the amendment go in as suggested by the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana desire the amendment of the Senator from Alabama adopted?

Mr. HARRISON. I consent to it as far as I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be incorporated in the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the first line of the first section of the amendment, after the word "persons," it is proposed to insert:

Qualified under the law to make locations and entries of land under the homestead or pre-emption or timber-culture laws—

So as to read:

That all persons, qualified under the law to make locations and entries of land under the homestead or pre-emption or timber-culture laws, who, between the 27th day of February, 1885, and the 17th day of April, 1885, in good faith entered upon any part of the great Sioux reservation, &c.

Mr. PLUMB. There are no timber-culture entries provided for, and it would only confuse matters to insert that phrase. I think it would be better to say:

All persons having the proper qualifications under the general land laws.

Mr. MORGAN. I put in "timber-culture" because the Senator from Indiana said he supposed some persons might have gone in there under the timber-culture laws.

Mr. PLUMB. Timber-culture entries are all provided for in the latter part of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to strike out "timber-culture."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That modification will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRISON. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "persons," in line 1 of the first section of the amendment, it is proposed to insert:

Qualified under the law to make locations and entries of land under the homestead or pre-emption laws.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that there are town-site entries made here. I have now before me the amendment I intended to suggest in the tenth line.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no personal qualification required for such entries.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not a question of personal qualification so much perhaps as of compliance with law.

Mr. INGALLS. Why is this qualification inserted here?

Mr. MORGAN. Because without it those persons who might have gone on these lands not qualified to take up homesteads would be admitted.

Mr. INGALLS. I should judge not. If the Senator will examine the lines at the head of page 2 I think he will see that no person can complete a claim on this domain except on compliance with law; that is, he "shall, for a period of ninety days after the proclamation of the President required to be made by section 22 of this act, have a right to re-enter upon said claims and complete the same as required by law."

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas, whether qualified originally to enter or not.

Mr. INGALLS. I think not.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Alabama will allow me to make a suggestion and see whether it does not meet the case. I suggest an amendment in line 10, so as to read:

And not included in the new reservation established by section 6 of this act, and who, being legally entitled to make such entry, located thereon homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims.

Mr. MORGAN. That will do. That is the same thing.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it perhaps comes in better there.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw my amendment then to allow the Senator from Indiana to make that change.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama is withdrawn, and the modification suggested by the Senator from Indiana will be made to his amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 10 of section 1 of the amendment, after the word "who," it is proposed to insert "being legally entitled to make such entry;" so as to read:

And who, being legally entitled to make such entry, located thereon homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims, &c.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire now to move an amendment to the first section of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. I move, after the word "thereon," at the end of line 10 of the first section of the amendment, to strike out the words "homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims" and insert "by actual settlement and improvement on any portion of such lands," so as to limit this to the persons who actually made improvements there and not extend it to the persons who may have simply put their feet there and immediately gone off.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. PLUMB. In other words, I distinguish between pirates and settlers, and having a desire to accomplish the object which is in view by the adoption of this amendment, to wit, to preserve the rights of actual settlers, I propose by this amendment to limit it to those persons and to those only.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know that I object to the Senator's amendment, but I do not suppose that a pre-emption claim is a matter of filing simply, or that a homestead claim is a matter of filing. It involves going upon the particular tract and making certain classes of improvements, and the filing follows, as I understand, after that is done.

Mr. INGALLS. If my colleague would read the evidence that has been taken in connection with the settlement of this reservation, he would find that the adoption of his amendment introduces a very embarrassing element. If he desires to promote the interests of those who have gone upon this reservation, I think the less said about good faith and improvements the better. Of course Senators are aware of the situation there, and I sympathize fully with my colleague in his desire to protect the public domain from depredations and to restrain the simulated and fabricated claims that are set up under the homestead and pre-emption and timber-culture laws. But really the idea of asserting that in good faith permanent and substantial improvements were made by persons intending to settle on this reservation has a very fragile foundation. I do therefore hope that my colleague will not embarass this situation by attempting to introduce that element.

Mr. PLUMB. If this will embarrass it, it is not because of the amendment but because of the fact which my colleague has referred to, but which I have not been advised about. But whatever the facts may be, there can certainly be no equity of the character which we should be called upon to recognize by legislation in this case unless it be an equity founded upon actual settlement made. If some one has gone upon these lands in the fugitive and uncertain and unsatisfactory way that my colleague intimates, then I think he is not entitled to be the beneficiary of this provision.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to read a moment from the testimony?

Mr. PLUMB. I will.

Mr. INGALLS. I propose to read from the testimony of a witness whom we examined at Pierre, I think. He was one of these settlers who went down in good faith to make permanent improvement on this reservation! He says he started the same night the telegram was received:

Q. How many of you went together?
A. Three of us went.
Q. You gave up your place in the printing-office, did you?
A. I did not give it up. I told them I was going down there, and they could put a man in my place for the time being.
Q. And they put a man in your place, and you went down in the reservation with two others?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who were the two others?
A. One was a traveling man who just happened to be in town. He said if he could get a good claim he would quit traveling.
Q. What was he traveling for?
A. A sirup-house in Dubuque, Iowa.
Q. What was his name?
A. Fred. Gunkel.
Q. Was it the first time you had met him?

A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was the other man?
A. Mr. Kretschmer.
Q. What position did he hold?
A. Clerk of the court here.
Q. Was he clerk at that time?
A. Yes, sir; and still is.

And so the story runs. I sincerely sympathize with the settlers on this reservation and desire that they shall be entitled to formulate all the rights that they have instituted; but if permanent improvements on the part of these drummers for sirup-houses in Dubuque and elsewhere are to be protected, do not put in good faith; it is too serious.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not responsible for the term "good faith," because that was in the amendment drawn by the Senator from Indiana; but I should like to have some tangible evidence of good faith. Now, residence is a compound of fact and intention. The intention we can only judge of, however, although it may exist, by the fact, and I think myself that any one who was a drummer for a sirup-house in Dubuque ought to be commended for desiring to get out of that business; and, so far as he was concerned, if he manifested his intention to get out of the business and made a home on these lands in the way the law requires, to wit, by not only going upon the land, but by making an improvement there which manifested that intention; and if that intention was continuously manifested until the time the second Presidential proclamation was issued, then I would give to that man the right to reenter upon the land and perfect his entry, and thereby give him the opportunity to carry out the good intention with which he had started.

It seems to me that unless we do something of this kind we are liable to be imposed upon; and when I say "imposed upon" I do not speak of that term as involving the taking of a large sum of money from the Treasury or of treating the public lands in a way that has been wholly unusual, but when we depart from the usual course of legislation to make reservations and exceptions concerning the public lands and the settlement thereon we ought to do it alone for those people who have done all they could do at least under a mistaken idea of the law into which they were led by the proclamation of the President, and not in favor of the people who went there purely for the purpose of speculation, or, at all events, who have left behind them no evidence of their intention bona fide to make a home upon the public domain. Therefore I think that this amendment for the purpose of carrying out the intention of the Senator from Indiana, which I entirely agree to, would be imperfect and improper without the amendment which I have proposed.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the regular order, being the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and one or two other Senators who are especially interested in the discussion of this bill are obliged to be absent from the Chamber to-day; and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill may be postponed until Monday morning, retaining its right as the unfinished business at 2 o'clock on that day, as it is now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Dakota.

Mr. DAWES. I appeal to the Senator who is upon the committee——

Mr. HARRISON. Let me in advance say to the Senator from Massachusetts that it is not possible for me to yield to any appeal.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps the Senator may tell better after he has heard the appeal.

Mr. HARRISON. I anticipated it, and as I am prepared to go on with the discussion and want to address the Senate on the Dakota bill, I do not want it postponed.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator does not want to hear the suggestion——

Mr. HARRISON. We can finish the other bill to-morrow in the morning hour. I shall be glad to help the Senator to do it, as I have tried to do this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the Dakota bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate provides for the admission of that part of the present Territory of Dakota lying south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude as a State in the Union. It declares that Congress accepts and ratifies the constitution and State government which the people of that portion of the Territory have formed for themselves. It provides that the State shall be entitled, until the next census, to one Representative in the House of Representatives. I may say in passing that according to the present apportionment the fraction in excess of the ratio of representation in Dakota is large enough to entitle her to two members of the House, and the people of Dakota have chosen two; but the committee decided not to support this apparently just demand, but to ask the people of Dakota to be content for the present with a single Representative in the other House. The other provisions of the bill are quite similar to those which may be found in the enabling acts and in the acts admitting States into the Union. The bill, I think, is rather less liberal in its land grants than has been customary.

I do not need to go further, I think, into the details of the bill. If this bill is to meet opposition, I take it for granted that it will not be upon these details, as to which, if there should be developed any differences of opinion, they could undoubtedly be speedily adjusted. The division will undoubtedly be upon the main proposition of the bill, which is as I have stated, the admission of Dakota under the constitution which her people have formed for themselves.

Mr. President, I agree that the work of constituting an American State, of adding another member to our Union, is legislation of serious import. There are considerations affecting the body of the States which may be fairly taken into account, and on the other hand there are considerations affecting the people who dwell in these Territories that are of the utmost concern and urgency to them. So far as it is in my power in this discussion I shall consider temperately and fairly every objection which has been suggested to the admission of Dakota as affecting the general interests of our whole people, and also those objections which have been made to the methods which the people of Dakota have adopted.

I agree that we may insist, indeed that we must insist, upon the presence of certain conditions as to area, population, productive capacity, wealth, and good disposition on the part of the people toward our institutions when any community of our people residing in any of the Territories asks for admission to the Union of the States. But, Mr. President, if these conditions exist in the case of Dakota, then I insist that the principles of the Constitution, the obligations of treaty and public law, and the highest possible considerations of fairness and justice call upon us to give to these people the full enjoyment of all the rights of American citizenship.

Mr. President, I invoke a candid, impartial, non-partisan consideration of the case of Dakota. I am somewhat encouraged to make this appeal because of some things that were said in debate at the last session of Congress, and of some things that have been said to me in private conversation by my friends on the other side of this Chamber. I am sure that no Senator who hears me would be willing to admit that he could be influenced in his vote upon this bill by any mere consideration of party advantage or detriment. I do not need to lift this discussion above that low plane. Its own merit and importance part it from such low associations. At the last session of Congress, when we were discussing an enabling act for Dakota, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] said:

> If those people decide that they want their Territory divided, and if they bring a constitution here which the Government of the United States is willing to accept as one republican in form, then I shall never vote against the admission of that Territory as a State because it may turn out in the next Presidential election or in any subsequent election to be a Republican State. I do not know how good I can make this pledge by a mere statement of this kind in advance. I can only express the conviction of my own heart upon the matter, and I do it without reserve.

It will be recollected that one of the objections which the Senator then urged to the bill was that it provided that the constitution of the new State should be submitted, not to Congress, but to the President of the United States, and that if found by him to be republican in form he should by proclamation declare the State admitted into the Union. I am able now to meet that objection. The people of Dakota have presented their constitution, and I offer it to the Senator from Alabama and to those who then held that view with him for their consideration and judgment whether it is not republican not only in form but in spirit.

Now, Mr. President, I want to discuss, without any attempt at oratory, in a simple and argumentative way, the features of this case as it is presented to the Senate and to the people of the United States. There are two solemn compacts to which the people of Dakota appeal; one is the treaty of 1803 with France under which we acquired this territory now called Dakota; the other is the ordinance of 1787, the benefits of which by public law have been extended to the people of that Territory.

Let me revive the recollection of Senators as to the provisions of this treaty and of that ordinance. The treaty with France contained this provision:

> ART. 3. The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess. (8 Stat. L., page 202.)

An appeal has been made and sustained in behalf of other States based upon this article of the treaty. When the State of Arkansas applied for admission into the Union, the advocates of her admission rested her claims upon this treaty stipulation. But this is not the only guarantee of Dakota. The ordinance of 1787 relating originally to the northwestern territory as ceded to the General Government by Virginia, has by subsequent acts been extended from time to time to other territory not acquired under that cession. The fifth article of that ordinance was as follows:

> And whenever any of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty—> and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: Provided, The constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and so far as it can be, consistent with the general interests of the confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000.

I call the Senate's attention—

Do I need to remind Senators that by these two solemn engagements, one taking the form of a treaty with a foreign power from which we were purchasing territory and stipulating in the interest of the people who did or should dwell within that territory, and the other a compact with one of the States of the Union in connection with the cession of a vast territory to the General Government and defining the uses of the grant, we have come under a high and imperious obligation to admit Dakota as a State? Do I need to appeal to these compacts at all? Is there a Senator here who will dissent from the proposition that the contemplated purpose in the acquisition of all this territory was that it might be filled by intelligent and patriotic citizens, and that so soon as these communities should be sufficiently populous to enable them to bear the burdens of a State government and to exercise its duties, they should be admitted into the Union of the States?

Mr. President, the idea of holding any body of our people permanently in a colonial relation to the General Government has always been distasteful to the statesmen of this country. Mr. Madison, speaking upon this subject, said:

> The inhabitants of that district of country—

He was speaking of the bill for the admission of Tennessee—

> The inhabitants of that district of country were at present in a degraded situation; they were deprived of a right essential to freemen—the right of being represented in Congress. Laws were made without their consent, or by their consent in part only. An exterior power had authority over their laws; an exterior power appointed their executive, which was not analogous to the other parts of the United States, and not justified by anything but an obvious and imperious necessity. He did not mean by this to censure the regulations of this provisional government, but he thought where there was doubt Congress ought to lean toward a decision which should give equal rights to every part of the American people.

Mr. Gallatin, speaking upon the same subject, referred to them as being in a "colonial condition." Mr. President, no one here can believe for a moment that the descendants of the men of 1776 will submit as a permanent condition thus to have their laws made for them and their executives and judges appointed by an exterior power. We must remember who these people are; we must not forget the lessons of our own history; and if we do not, we shall not be impatient with these men who upon our frontier are now urgently demanding to be clothed with the right to select their own governors and judges and to make their own laws.

Is there a Senator here who if his own political rights or those of his people were thus shorn, would not be impatiently demanding that they should be restored to him? These people were lately citizens of my State and of yours, Mr. President, possessed there of a full citizenship, taking part in the choice of the Chief Executive of the nation, represented here in the Senate and on the floor of the other House, full participants in all the affairs of Government. They went upon the kindly invitation of this Government into that new region, and they carried with them there our solemn guarantee that in due time they should be reclothed with those political rights which they had enjoyed in the States. But the people of the Territories suffer not only these political disabilities, but they are deprived of many of the guarantees which a State constitution throws about property and the affairs of human life. I have recently had my attention called to the fact that municipalities in many of our Territories, and even the Territories themselves, have been incurring large and burdensome debts. In nearly all of our States our constitutions impose some limitation upon the power of these bodies to incur debts, and thus throw about property a safeguard which the people of the Territories do not possess.

In the case of Dakota, as in the case of all our Territories, we provided them at first with a legislative council of twelve members and a house of representatives of twenty-four members. We have in the case of Dakota been compelled to double the number in each. We provide the Territories usually with three judges. We have been compelled in the case of Dakota to more than double the judiciary of the Territory, and at this very session the Senator from Arkansas has presented a bill to add two more Federal judges for that Territory. The fact is, the habiliments of the Territorial government have become unsuited. There has been a development in population and wealth which makes this form of government burdensome and insufficient. A Territorial form of government is in its plan and purpose temporary. It is the best we can devise for a weak and scattered community, but to Dakota it has become inappropriate and burdensome.

Mr. President, what are some of the conditions that we may reasonably insist upon when one of these frontier communities asks to pass from a Territorial condition to the condition of a State in the American Union? Of course there must be sufficient area to constitute a State. The original areas of some of the original States were matters of chance. They were either land grants or some other form of colonial organization or attempt. But since we began the business of carving States out of the public domain let us see what has been from time to time the expressed judgment of Congress as to the appropriate size of a State. Look at Ohio, Indiana, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska. We have in these States examples of what in the particular cases was deemed by Congress to be a sufficient area for a State.

Mr. President, does any one object that the area of South Dakota is insufficient to constitute a State? If that objection were held untenable except it came from a Senator who represented a larger State than the proposed State of Dakota, there would be very few to make the objection.

Dakota, divided upon the forty-sixth parallel, will give us south of that line a State having an area of about 77,000 square miles. Its greatest length north and south is about 430 miles, and its greatest width about 370 miles. In this connection the areas of some of the existing States are interesting. Alabama has 52,250 square miles. Will the Senators from that great State insist that Dakota, with 25,000 square miles more, is too small? Arkansas has 53,850 square miles. Will her Senators say that a State 24,000 square miles larger than Arkansas is too small? Florida has 58,680 square miles, about 20,000 square miles less than the proposed State of Dakota. Georgia has an area of 59,475 square miles.

Is a State nearly 20,000 square miles larger than Georgia in the judgment of the distinguished Senators from that State too small a State? Illinois has a territory of 56,650 square miles. Is a State 21,000 square miles larger than the great State of Illinois too small a State? Indiana has a territory of 36,350 square miles. Is a State more than twice as large as Indiana to be objected to on the ground of her small area? Iowa has an area of 56,025 square miles. Kentucky has 40,400 square miles, 37,000 square miles less than the proposed State of Dakota. Maine has an area of only 33,040 square miles, less by nearly 10,000 square miles than one-half the area of the proposed State of Dakota. Mississippi has an area of 46,810 square miles. Do the Senators from Mississippi think that a State having an area 30,000 square miles larger than their own is too small? But I shall not pursue these comparisons further.

Dakota as defined by the bill will be the eighth State in size in the Union. I do not believe that I shall hear from any Senator who may oppose the passage of the bill an objection that the area of the State is not sufficient. Judged by what Congress has done from the time we began carving States out of a limitless territory, Dakota is possessed of a most ample area. Dakota is among the largest of the States thus constituted.

I turn next, Mr. President, to consider the question of population, for I agree that it is not area but people that constitute a State. I find in examining the history of the admission of the States that there have been just two rules suggested in the case of States to which the provisions of the ordinance of 1787 applied. It has been argued by some of our ablest statesmen that we could not insist upon a population greater than 60,000, because that was the limit nominated in the ordinance. The only other limit that has been suggested by anybody in the frequent debates upon the subject is that the State should have at the time of admission a population equal to the ratio or unit of representation in the House of Representatives.

From the report of the Committee on Territories which accompanies the bill I read an extract upon the subject.

> In the case of Kansas, Congress in terms declared, in view of the contingency of the rejection of the Lecompton constitution, that—
> "In that event the people of said Territory are hereby authorized and empowered to form for themselves a constitution and State government, by the name of the State of Kansas, according to the Federal Constitution, and may elect delegates for that purpose, whenever, and not before, it is ascertained by a census duly and legally taken that the population of said Territory equals or exceeds the ratio of representation required for a member of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States." (11 Stats. L., 270).
> The friends of slavery did not venture to demand more, intent as they were upon the exclusion of Kansas as a free State.
>
> In his message to Congress (December 6, 1858), President Buchanan gives his hearty support to this provision of the "English bill," and urges that it be made general. He says:
>
> "This excellent provision which Congress has applied to Kansas ought to be extended and rendered applicable to all Territories which may hereafter seek admission into the Union."
>
> But here Mr. Buchanan was reminded of Oregon, a promising young Territory, a majority of whose people were politically in accord with his administration, and though Oregon had less than half the population required by the rule, he suggests an exception in her case:
>
> "Of course [he says] it would be unjust to give this rule a retrospective application and exclude a State which, acting upon the past practice of the Government, has already formed its constitution, elected its Legislature and other officers, and is now prepared to enter the Union."
> The President's view was adopted, and in February following Oregon was admitted with a population of 44,630, while the existing ratio of representation was 93,492.

During the Forty-eighth Congress a bill embodying the requirement, as to all States hereafter admitted, that they should have a population equal to the ratio of representation was favorably reported in the House, but was not acted upon.

In the report made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in the Forty-seventh Congress upon the Dakota bill this was the rule he suggested, and when in debate I endeavored to induce him to suggest what other rule he would apply, I failed to get any response.

I am speaking now solely as to population. I assume that all the other conditions are right. If a sufficient population to entitle the people to one Representative in the lower House is not a sufficient population to entitle a Territory to admission, what is? Some fair and equal rule ought to be applied to all these cases.

Dakota has by census south of the forty-sixth parallel 263,465, and north of that parallel 152,199 people. It had that number on the 1st day of June last by actual count. The returns of this census, taken under the act of Congress, have been certified to the Secretary of the Interior. South Dakota has 110,000 people more than the ratio of representation in the House of Representatives. I ask again, if this is not sufficient population, what is?

But, Mr. President, there is another condition that we may insist upon. I think we may fairly inquire whether these people of Dakota who were counted in the census taken are permanent settlers of the region in which they now dwell; whether they are there engaged in avocations which insure permanency. It has been said that in one case we have admitted a State into the Union whose population did not have this character but whose employments and industries were transient and soon exhausted.

Mr. President, wherever we have an agricultural population we have a permanent population. The people of Dakota are in great part a people settled upon farms, tilling the soil—not digging in mines whose richness may be marvelous to-day and whose treasures may be exhausted to-morrow, but drawing their sustenance out of that exhaustless mine, a rich soil, whose power may be under skillful husbandry recuperated and preserved.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate briefly to some of the statistics of production in the case of Dakota. There has been an impression that the farms of Dakota were held in vast bodies by a few persons. The fact is that there are in south Dakota 50,237 farms, containing 3,754,864 acres of tilled land. The average size of the farms in South Dakota is only 194 acres. There was produced in the year 1885, 7,523,030 bushels of corn. South Dakota lies in considerable part within the corn belt. The same year there was produced nearly 13,000,000 bushels of wheat, over two millions and a quarter bushels of flax, and nearly 12,000,000 bushels of oats. The value of the farms was $87,131,050; the value of the live stock was nearly $26,000,000; the value of the farm products was nearly $18,000,000; and the assessment for taxation from which these figures are taken is exceedingly low.

I do not expect to be met by the suggestion from the opponents of the bill that Dakota has not within herself the ability to give employment and support to its fair proportion of the increasing population of this country. We shall not, I think, hear the suggestion that there is danger that this State will dwindle away by reason of the exhaustion of its industries and sources of wealth. I do not believe any candid man will have any trouble on that score.

What has been the history of our great agricultural States? Take my own State and her sister States that lie on either side; what has been their history? One of continued growth. There has been no check, but a continuous progress in population and in the accumulated wealth which their industries bring. What has been true in the case of these States will be true in the case of Dakota; no reason can be given why it should not be so.

Mr. President, what is lacking? With an area that will place the State the eighth in size in the Union, with a population sufficient to entitle her to two Representatives in the lower House, with a productive capacity that is already demonstrated to be greater than that of many of the older States, what is needed? How shall we justify ourselves in denying to these people a full participation in the affairs of the Government?

I can think of no other condition that we may rightfully insist upon, except it be one already suggested, that her people shall be found to be in sympathy with the civilization of our country; that they shall be a patriotic people; that they shall not and do not cherish among themselves any institution that is out of line with our Christian civilization. Some bitter things have been said about the people of Dakota, but I venture to say that the suggestion will not be heard in this debate that her people in their respect for the institutions of education and religion, in their devotion to good order, in their patriotic love for the Constitution and flag of their country, are at a disadvantage in a comparison with the people of any State.

It is true of Dakota, as it is of all our Northwestern States, largely settled since the war, that the men who came home after bearing the heat of that great conflict, the men who established the union of the States and brought back the banner of their country in triumph, have in large numbers found new homes within her borders. They accepted the kindly invitation of the Government, which ameliorated some of the land laws in their interest. Kansas and Nebraska and Dakota have within their limits a larger per cent. of the men who helped to make the war for the Union successful than many of the older States. This circumstance may to some extent account for the fact that the people of Dakota have been restive and even resentful under what they have thought to be reflections upon them. It is quite natural that those who by their courage rescued the institutions of their country and gave perpetuity to its Constitution and Government, should be restive under the suggestion that they shall now without reason be kept out of a full participation in its benefits.

Mr. President, again I ask, what is lacking in the case of Dakota? I have heard it suggested that its great lack was that there were not enough Democrats in the Territory. I have not heard it here; it has been an outside and doubtless an unauthorized suggestion. It is one that I am sure no Senator will make here, for to coerce the free sentiment of a people, to make the enjoyment of political rights contingent upon a political faith, is something that I am sure every Senator would feel to be discreditable.

I hear the suggestion also, but not here, that we shall mate Dakota with some other Territory where the prevailing political sentiment is supposed to be of an opposite sort. Can we not get rid of this old and disreputable mating business? It grew out of slavery. It grew out of the fact that the men of the South felt that the institution of slavery was in peril, and that they could only preserve it by preserving an equilibrium between the free and the slave States. But slavery has gone. The issues that divide parties now are those of finance and revenue.

Mr. President, for one I declare that without reference to the prevailing political sentiment of any of these Territories whose admission into the Union has been suggested, I am ready to consider and decide the question of their admission to the Union upon the same principles that I apply to-day in the case of Dakota. No Territory applying for admission, while I am a member of this body, no matter how strongly Democratic sentiment may prevail in the Territory, shall have at my hands any other treatment than that fair treatment which I now ask for Dakota.

If the necessary conditions for the safe creation of a State are here, what is the next objection? It is one of methods. It is said Dakota has pursued an unusual and even disorderly course, and that we can not, without establishing a bad precedent, admit her under the constitution she has formed.

I propose to go to the precedents in these cases, and if I do not parallel the case of Dakota in every particular until the opponents of this measure are unable to mention a single circumstance of distinction between the case of Dakota and the case of the admission of other States, then I have failed altogether to read aright the legislative history of the admission of the States.

What has been done by the people of Dakota? An act of the Territorial Legislature was passed last March providing for a constitutional convention and apportioning the members of the convention fairly according to population throughout that part of the Territory south of the forty-sixth parallel. The act was passed unanimously in the council, 20 votes being recorded in the affirmative and none in the negative. The vote in the House was 33 in the affirmative and 7 in the negative. The sentiment in favor of the movement was practically unanimous in a Legislature made up of representatives from all parts of the present Territory.

I do not stop to discuss the legal effect of that law. It is not important that we should waste time over that subject. It is enough to say that in the cases of four, five, or six of the States that course has been taken. It is enough to know that it methodized and formulated the proceedings of the convention, and threw about all its acts if not the sanction at least the forms of law.

The next step was the election of delegates to the convention and the gathering of those delegates in convention. The result of their work was the constitution now laid before the Senate. It was submitted to a popular vote and ratified. The abstract of the vote, which is submitted with the constitution, shows that there were 25,226 votes in favor of the constitution and 6,565 votes against it, making a total vote of 31,791.

I do not think I ought to stop to discuss the provisions of the constitution itself. We are not here to make a constitution for Dakota. We have the right to insist upon certain necessary articles of compact, as has been the custom in the case of all the States; we have a right to impose conditions with reference to the grants of school and other lands which the Government gives to the State; but I take it I shall find no Senator here, and particularly no Senator on the other side of the Chamber, who will insist that it is our duty to go through the provisions of this constitution and to vote for or against the admission of the State as we think the provisions of the constitution are wise or unwise. These people are to live under the constitution, not we. They have framed it; we know that it meets their wishes, and we must believe that it meets their wants.

It will be found that with reference to school lands the constitution contains most conservative and wise provisions. In article 8 it is provided:

SEC. 2. All proceeds of the sale of public lands that have heretofore been or may hereafter be given by the United States for the use of public schools in the State; all such per centum as may be granted by the United States on the sales of public lands; the proceeds of all property that shall fall to the State by escheat; the proceeds of all gifts or donations to the State for public schools or not otherwise appropriated by the terms of the gift; and all property otherwise acquired for public schools, shall be and remain a perpetual fund for the maintenance of public schools in the State. It shall be deemed a trust and held by the State. The principal shall forever remain inviolate, and may be increased, but shall never be diminished, and the State shall make good all losses thereof which may in any manner occur.

With reference to the sale of the school lands it is provided:

SEC. 4. After one year from the assembling of the first Legislature, the lands granted to the State by the United States for the use of public schools may be sold upon the following conditions, and no other: Not more than one-third of all such lands shall be sold within the first five years, and no more than two-thirds within the first fifteen years after the title thereto is vested in the State, and the Legislature shall, subject to the provisions of this article, provide for the sale of the same.

SEC. 5. No lands shall be sold for less than the appraised value and in no case for less than $10 an acre, unless after the year A. D. 1900 two consecutive Legislatures concur in a law otherwise directing. The purchaser shall pay one-fourth of the price in cash and the remaining three-fourths as follows: One-fourth in five years, one-fourth in ten years, one-fourth in fifteen years, with interest thereon at the rate of not less than 6 per cent. per annum, payable annually in advance; but all such subdivided lands may be sold for cash, provided that upon payment of the interest for one full year in advance, the balance of the purchase price may be paid at any time. All sales shall be at public auction to the highest bidder, after sixty days' advertisement of the same in a newspaper of general circulation in the vicinity of the lands to be sold, and one at the seat of government. Such lands as shall not have been especially subdivided shall be offered in tracts of not more than 80 acres, and those so subdivided in the smallest subdivisions. All lands designated for sale not sold within four years after appraisal, shall be reappraised by the board of appraisal as hereinbefore provided before they are sold.

The compact with the United States will be found in article 22, and is as follows:

The following article shall be irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of this State: First, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of this State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; secondly, that the people inhabiting this State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands of the United States lying within the State, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without this State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof, and that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to, or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States.

We have in this compact everything that has been contained in the compacts made with the other States.

As to the method pursued, I have already, I think, called attention to the fact that in section 32 of the schedule of the constitution it is expressly provided that all of the steps taken by Dakota in the formation of this constitution and in the election of her State officers shall be dependent upon the action of Congress in admitting the State into the Union; that not one further step is to be taken. In other words, that Dakota has simply made herself ready and stands now at the door of Congress asking that act which shall constitute her a State. Section 32 is as follows:

SEC. 32. Nothing in this constitution or schedule contained shall be construed to authorize the Legislature to exercise any powers except such as are necessary to its organization, to elect United States Senators, to provide and pass means and measures necessary, preliminary, and incident to admission to the Union and to assemble and reassemble and adjourn from time to time; neither to authorize any officer of the executive or administrative departments to exercise any powers of his office except such as may be preliminary and incident to admission to the Union; nor to authorize any officer of the Judiciary Department to exercise any of the duties of his office until the State of Dakota shall have been regularly admitted into the Union, except such as may be authorized by the Congress of the United States.

I do not stop to discuss the proposition whether she is a State. I do not know how any community can become a State of the Union without the consent of Congress. Dakota may well take up the language of the appeal that was made in behalf of California. It was said for the people of that State:

The people request admission to the American Union as a State. They understand and estimate the advantages which will accrue to them from such a connection, while they trust they do not too highly compute those that will be conferred upon their brethren. They do not present themselves as suppliants, nor do they bear themselves with arrogance or presumption; they come as free American citizens by treaty, by adoption, and by birth, and ask that they may be permitted to reap the common benefits, share the common ills, and promote the common welfare as one of the United States of America.

Let us look now at some of the precedents. It has been said that the case of Dakota is the first case where the people of a part of a Territory have undertaken for themselves to carve out a certain portion of an organized territory and to organize it into a State. That is not true, Mr. President. In the case of California, as I had occasion to remark the other day, there never was any act of Congress assigning any limits or boundaries to California. California never had any civil Territorial organization nor any enabling act. The bounds of that State were first defined by its own constitutional convention.

But a still more instructive and interesting case is that of Iowa. Iowa proceeded without any enabling act and proposed to Congress the following boundaries:

Beginning in the middle of the main channel of the Mississippi River, opposite the mouth of the Des Moines River; thence up the said river Des Moines, in the middle of the main channel thereof, to a point where it is intersected by the old Indian boundary line or line run by John C. Sullivan in the year 1816; thence westwardly along said line to the "old northwest corner of Missouri;" thence due west to the middle of the main channel of the Missouri River; thence up in the middle of the main channel of the river last mentioned to the mouth of the Sioux or Calumet River; thence in a direct line to the middle of the main channel of the Saint Peter's River where the Watonwan River (according to Nicollet's map) enters the same; thence down the middle of the main channel of said river to the middle of the main channel of the Mississippi River; thence down the middle of the main channel of said river to the place of beginning.

In other words, Iowa proposed to run her lines up to the Saint Peter's River, down that river to Fort Snelling, and down the Mississippi River to its present southern boundary. She presented to Congress a constitution framed by the people of that part of the Territory. At that time the Territory of Iowa embraced a large extent of country to the northwest of the lines proposed, being now parts of Minnesota and the present Territory of Dakota. There is a perfect parallel to what was done in the case of Dakota. When this constitution was presented Congress declined to admit the State of Iowa with those limits, and assigned certain other limits embracing an area smaller than the present State.

Mr. BUTLER. If it does not interfere with the Senator, I should like just there to ask him a question. Do I understand him to state that Iowa had not an enabling act?

Mr. HARRISON. Iowa had no enabling act. Iowa did just what Dakota has done; she proposed to organize a State out of a part of the territory then constituting the Territory of Iowa. That is the point I am making. Congress refused to admit Iowa with these bounds, and suggested certain other bounds. I have had them marked off here upon an old map in order that Senators might see exactly the bounds suggested by Iowa and the bounds proposed by Congress. The original constitution of Iowa proposed the boundaries that I have just read. Congress proposed in return to Iowa that she should accept the boundaries indicated here [indicating], as Senators will see a much smaller area than that at present embraced within the State. The people of Iowa rejected that proposition by a popular vote, and then again, without any enabling act, proposed to Congress the present boundaries of the State, and was admitted with those boundaries.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] reminds me that while his State had an enabling act, yet that the boundaries suggested by it embraced a much larger area than was finally proposed by the State in the constitution which was accepted and ratified by Congress. It appears, then, that Kansas did not proceed upon the enabling act and organize according to the bounds suggested in it, but prescribed smaller boundaries for herself which were accepted by Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. The original boundaries of Kansas extended from the Missouri River on the north to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, thence running south along the crest of the mountains to its present southern boundary, and thence eastward to the point where the boundary now terminates. I was a member of the convention that framed the constitution at Wyandotte, under which the State was admitted into the Union on the 29th of January, 1861, and that convention amputated more than one-third of the western portion of the then existing Territory of Kansas, and proposed in our ordinance, which was preliminary to the constitution, that we should be admitted with those boundaries, and they were accepted by Congress without question, and now constitute the area of the State.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Kansas for this contribution. I was attempting to meet the proposition, which seems to me the last refuge of some of those who are attacking the proceedings of Dakota, that Congress had not suggested any boundaries for the State; that the only suggested boundaries were the present boundaries of the Territory of Dakota, and that the people were guilty of disorderly and unprecedented conduct in proposing to constitute a State out of something less than the present Territory of Dakota. It appears that we have precedents for this course all about us, and why should it not be so? It is a mere proposition from the people to Congress to be admitted with certain bounds. It is competent for Congress to accept or reject, but it is certainly not disrespectful or disorderly in the people of the Territory to propose not only boundaries but a constitution.

We have a case now before us of a Democratic Territory that without an enabling act has adopted and presented to Congress a State constitution. It is presented by a Democratic Senator, my colleague. This constitution of Montana was adopted two years ago and not previously submitted to Congress. The people of the Territory in the exercise of a popular right assembled, framed a constitution, and now present it for our consideration, and I stop to say that it shall have my respectful consideration and just such treatment as I ask in the case of Dakota. The memorial accompanying it comes to us signed by the Democratic governor of the Territory of Montana, recently appointed, and by the Delegate in the lower House of Congress, also a Democrat, and by other distinguished Democrats of that Territory. I have not heard it suggested that there was anything disorderly or unprecedented or that called for preliminary inquiry in the fact that Montana has thus presented her claims for admission.

The Senator from Alabama at the last Congress, in the extract which I read at the beginning of my remarks, expressed his willingness to abide by the opinion of the people of the Territory as to whether there ought to be a division. I wish to call attention now to what has been done expressive of a settled wish of the people that the Territory should be divided upon the line proposed. There has been no popular vote on the subject except the vote on the constitution. If the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator is sincerely desirous to know what the sentiment of the people of Dakota upon the question of division is, then I call his attention first to the fact that the people of South Dakota, by a majority of 18,661 out of a total vote of 31,791, have declared in favor of division. This leaves no doubt as to what the sentiment of the people of South Dakota is upon the question of division. As to what the sentiment of the people north of the forty-sixth parallel is on this subject I call attention to the fact that from the year 1871 down to the year 1885, I believe, without the omission of a single session, the people of that Territory, through their Legislature, have been memorializing Congress for a division upon the forty-sixth parallel.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Has the Senator any data which authorize him to state what proportion of the actual voters residing within South Dakota participated in the election?

Mr. HARRISON. I am not able to answer the question exactly. The total vote of the whole of Dakota at the last election was about 85,000. I suppose there must be in the neighborhood of 50,000 voters in South Dakota, and of that 50,000 nearly 32,000 participated in the vote upon the constitution. I am glad to be inquired of as to any of these matters. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I have taken the pains to examine the votes given in some of the other Territories for their State constitutions, and I venture to say that he will not find a larger vote, a larger majority, or a larger per cent. of the total voting population represented in the adoption of any constitution that was ever adopted in any other Territory preliminary to its admission to the Union. I have especially looked into the cases of Iowa and Missouri.

I was about to call attention to what the people of Dakota have said to Congress on the subject of division. The desire for and expectation of division has entered into much of their legislation. You can scarcely pick up a volume of the session laws of the Territory of Dakota from 1871 to this time that does not contain some expression of the opinion not only that division was desirable, but that it would certainly come about. All of the educational institutions of Dakota have been established with a direct reference to division. The bonds issued to build them have been designated by law to be paid by the southern portion of the Territory, or by the northern portion, according to their location, when the Territory should be divided.

As early as January, 1871, a memorial was unanimously adopted by the Territorial Legislature praying Congress to divide Dakota upon the forty-sixth parallel of latitude and to organize two Territorial governments for the people. In December, 1872, another memorial asking a division of the Territory was adopted by the Territorial Legislature, the vote in the council for the memorial being unanimous, and in the house 21 to 4. In December, 1874, the Legislature again adopted a memorial to Congress, praying for the passage of a bill dividing the Territory upon the forty-sixth parallel and organizing the north part thereof into a Territory, to be called Pembina. The vote upon this memorial was unanimous in the house, and in the council 12 to 1. In January, 1877, another memorial asking the same relief was passed without a dissenting vote in either branch of the Legislature.

In 1881 the Legislature adopted a memorial praying Congress to divide Dakota into three Territories. This was adopted in the house by a majority of 1, and in the council by a majority of 6.

In February, 1885, another memorial was adopted by the Legislature praying for the passage of the bill for the division of the Territory upon the forty-sixth parallel and the admission of that portion lying south of that line as a State. This memorial referred to the bill which passed the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress. The vote in the Territorial Legislature in favor of the adoption of this memorial was unanimous in both branches. I quote one paragraph of this memorial:

And although the people of all Dakota are earnestly in favor of admission of the southern half as a State, still they will hail with joy division only, and if asking for admission of the southern half as a State will in any manner delay division, then we earnestly request division, without the admission prayed for, at the earliest possible time.

If legislative bodies are representative bodies, the opinion of the people can not be in doubt.

I have called the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the expression of the people of the southern portion of the Territory in the vote for the constitution. I call his attention now to this series of memorials, running through fourteen years, from the Legislature of that Territory, asking for division, and I respectfully suggest that such a unanimity of expression from eight or ten Legislatures is conclusive as to popular opinion in the whole Territory.

Mr. CONGER. They were from North Dakota as well.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; the members of those Legislatures, of course, were from North Dakota as well as South Dakota. I suggested that the laws of the Territory were so full of expressions upon this subject that you could scarcely pick up a copy of the session laws of the Territory without finding it. I have references to some of these laws. In the session of 1885, in an act to establish a school of mines, to be located in South Dakota, it is provided:

In case of a division of the Territory of Dakota, that part of said Territory in which said school of mines is located after such division shall assume and pay all bonds and coupons existing at the time by reason of the erection of the building herein provided for.

I have here a dozen or fifteen such extracts from the session laws of Dakota, running back to 1871. Through each of these laws, providing for the establishment of educational institutions, of penal institutions, of benevolent institutions, runs this uniform provision that when the Territory is divided the debt, if any remains, shall be assumed and paid by South or North Dakota, as the case may be.

I wish to disabuse the minds of Senators of the idea, if any such opinion prevails, that this is a party question in the Territory of Dakota. I have in my hand a memorial to the Legislature of Dakota praying for the passage of the Territorial act which provided for the constitutional convention. It is signed, among others, by Hon. Bartlett Tripp, one of the very foremost lawyers of Dakota and one of the leading and most influential Democrats in that Territory, a gentleman who has been appointed by the present Administration, in recognition of his high standing as a lawyer and as a Democrat, chief-justice of the Territory of Dakota. I have a memorial signed by him, and I read an extract from the opening part of it:

That the interests of the people of Dakota, material, political and moral; their numbers, area, and resources; their rights under the Constitution; their rights under the guarantees of the ordinance of 1787; their rights under the treaty with France, of 1803, by which their Territory was acquired, and the unanimous wishes of all its people, as evinced by the bill passed by the Legislature of 1881, for a constitutional convention; by the votes of the people of South Dakota at the Huron and Sioux Falls conventions of 1883; by the resolutions of the Republican and Democratic conventions of 1884, demand in the strongest terms the division of the Territory and the admission of the southern half as a State of the Union.

There is an expression signed by men whose influence and position, whose opportunities to know public sentiment in the Territory, can not be questioned, declaring that it is practically the unanimous sentiments of both sections of the Territory.

I come now to refer to some of the precedents in connection with the admission of the States. I have tried to establish the proposition that all of the conditions that could be insisted upon by Congress as necessary to the admission of a State, area, population, productive capacity, a good and loyal disposition on the part of its people, exist in the case of Dakota. I have undertaken to show that the overwhelming sentiment of her people as expressed by resolutions, memorials to Congress, by the acts of her Legislature, and by the platforms of the political conventions of both parties in Dakota, is in favor of division. If this be so, has she pursued such a course in framing and submitting her constitution as entitles her to respectful attention at the hands of Congress? I shall not attempt to bring out all the incidents connected with the admission of the States that have formed constitutions for themselves without an enabling act. I call the attention of Senators to the full discussion of this matter in the report submitted by the committee.

Tennessee is the first case in order of time. Tennessee is ably represented here by Senators of her choice. May I not ask those distinguished Senators whether they are prepared to say in the case of Dakota that the method of procedure adopted by their ancestors, by those brave, fearless, and able men who organized a State government for Tennessee under which they came into the Union of the States, is so disorderly, so irregular, so disrespectful to Congress that they will vote for the rejection of Dakota. Tennessee by a popular movement called a constitutional convention formed a constitution and elected State officers. The account of her further proceedings is thus given in Hough's American Constitutions:

Their labors being completed, on the 6th of February an engrossed copy was read and passed; on the 19th an engrossed copy was forwarded to the President, with a notification that on the 28th day of March, at which time the Legislature would meet to act on the constitution, the temporary government established by Congress would cease.

Dakota has sent no such message as that here. On the other hand, Dakota comes and says, "Your Territorial government will continue its authority unimpaired over us without any resistance on our part until Congress has favorably acted upon our application for admission as a State;" Tennessee announced to the General Government that on a given day she would put her State government into operation, and that the power and control of the Territorial government organized by Congress would cease on that day.

General Washington, then President of the United States, having received an engrossed copy of the constitution of Tennessee accompanied by the message to which I have referred, did not get into any state of alarm as to the loyalty of the people of Tennessee; he did not rebuke them; he did not suggest that there was a taint of revolution or a suggestion of secession in the movement, but taking the constitution adopted by the people he transmitted it to Congress accompanied by a message. Let me read that message. It is as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: By an act of Congress passed on the 26th of May, 1790, it was declared that the inhabitants of the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio should enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of Congress for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio; and that the government of said territory south of the Ohio should be similar to that which was then exercised in the territory northwest of the Ohio, except so far as was otherwise provided in the conditions expressed in an act of Congress passed the 2d of April, 1790, entitled "An act to accept a cession of the claims of the State of North Carolina to a certain district of western territory."

Note now what President Washington said:

Among the privileges, benefits, and advantages thus secured to the inhabitants of the territory south of the river Ohio appear to be the right of forming a permanent constitution and State government, and of admission as a State, by its Delegates, into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever when it should have therein 60,000 free inhabitants: Provided, The constitution and government so to be formed should be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in the articles of the said ordinance.

As proofs of the several requisites to entitle the Territory south of the river Ohio to be admitted as a State into the Union, Governor Blount has transmitted a return of the enumeration of its inhabitants, and a printed copy of the constitution and form of government on which they have agreed, which, with his letters accompanying the same, are herewith laid before Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, April 8, 1796.

President Washington argues that these people, under the ordinance of 1787, had the absolute right to initiate proceedings and form a State government, and notwithstanding their memorial was accompanied by the peremptory suggestion which I have stated he does not stop to rebuke or criticise that at all, but, so far as he might, promoted the admission of the State.

May I not appeal in behalf of Dakota to those Senators on this floor who represent a State which was thus received into the union of the United States, not to assume an unfriendly attitude toward one that comes without any suggestion of a termination of the control of the Territorial government, but comes submissively, having offended in nothing except that it has organized for itself a constitution and State government? I appeal with confidence to those who represent Tennessee upon this floor not to deny to the people of Dakota that which was cheerfully given to the people of their own State, and not to stigmatize the conduct of those brave men who formed the great State of Tennessee by voting here that the proceedings of Dakota are disrespectful or disorderly. I pause to suggest here that among the defenders of the course of Tennessee, among those who voted for her admission to the Union, was Wade Hampton, of South Carolina, in the House of Representatives, and Senator Butler, of the same State, in the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not understand the Senator. What was the proposition?

Mr. HARRISON. The proposition was to admit Tennessee under the constitution she had formed for herself, and if I have not misread the records of the vote upon this question Wade Hampton, of South Carolina, in the House, and Senator Butler, of the same State, in the Senate, sustained the course of Tennessee and voted for her admission.

Mr. HAMPTON. May I interrupt the Senator a moment to ask him what date that was?

Mr. HARRISON. I beg to assure the Senator from South Carolina who sits farthest from me that I was not suggesting that he in his own person voted upon the question of the admission of Tennessee. I was referring to a venerated ancestor of his whose example I was commending to him.

A good deal has been said about the revolutionary conduct of the people of Dakota. Let me read what Mr. Gallatin said in the case of Tennessee. He said:

The people of the Southwestern Territory became ipso facto a State the moment they amounted to 60,000 free inhabitants, and that it became the duty of Congress, as part of the original compact, to recognize them as such and to admit them into the Union whenever they had satisfactory proof of the fact.

My friend from Missouri, who announced the other day that he differed with Mr. Benton living and differed with him still, will find himself, before we get through, differing with a great many other able statesmen who have discussed this question in Congress. Mr. Gallatin is one. The Senator from Missouri does not need to produce the fugitive utterance of some one in a pamphlet issued in Dakota asserting the doctrine that Dakota is a State. I have read what Mr. Gallatin said in the case of Tennessee, that, under the ordinance of 1787, when 60,000 free inhabitants were found within a Territory it became ipso facto a State, and did not need to wait for the recognition of Congress to have a de facto existence as a State.

The case of Michigan is full of interest. Michigan practically overturned the Territorial government. Having called her constitutional convention, adopted her constitution, and elected her governor and judges, she put that government in operation and virtually suspended the function of all officers sent there under the Territorial organization. It is worth while to see how they presented themselves to Congress. The communication which these gentlemen from Michigan sent to the President of the United States was as follows:

WASHINGTON, December 9, 1835.

SIR: The undersigned, elected Senators and Representatives to Congress from the State of Michigan, have the honor to transmit to you, herewith, an additional authentic copy of the constitution adopted by the convention of Michigan on the 24th day of June, 1835, and ratified by the people of the same on the first Monday and the succeeding day in October, 1835.

We have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your most obedient servants,

JOHN NORVELL.
LUCIUS LYON.
ISAAC E. CRARY.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

This communication was addressed to the President of the United States, Andrew Jackson. Instead of taking fright at the fact that these people spoke of the State of Michigan, as seems to be the disposition in some quarters here, Andrew Jackson transmits the certified copy of the constitution submitted to him with this communication to Congress, and in his message makes an argument in favor of the right of the State to organize. Here is his message. I read only part of it:

The territory comprised within these limits being part of the district of country described in the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, which provides that whenever any of the States into which the same should be divided should have 60,000 free inhabitants, each State should be admitted by its delegates "into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government, provided the constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles," &c., the inhabitants thereof have, during the present year, in pursuance of the right secured by the ordinance, formed a constitution and State government. That instrument, together with various other documents connected therewith, has been transmitted to me for the purpose of being laid before Congress, to whom the power and duty of admitting new States into the Union exclusively appertains; and the whole are herewith communicated for your early decision.

So it appears that Andrew Jackson presented to the Senate a communication in which certain persons described themselves as "Senators from the State of Michigan," not only without any criticism but accompanied by an argument that the people of Michigan had a right to organize a State government and elect Senators, and that it was the duty of Congress to admit them.

I called attention the other day to the fact that the credentials of these Senators were presented by Mr. Benton to the Senate of the United States, and that the entry made in our Journal was as follows:

Mr. Benton presented the credentials of the Hon. Lucius Lyon and the Hon. John Norvell, elected by the Legislature of Michigan Senators from that State, which were read. Mr. Benton then moved that seats be assigned to Mr. Lyon and Mr. Norvell on the floor of the Senate until the decision of the question of their admission as Senators.

I shall not stop to read what was said by many distinguished Democrats upon the question of the admission of Michigan. Let me quote an extract from Mr. Buchanan:

I think their course is clearly justifiable—

Senators will recollect what the course of Michigan had been, and how it contrasts and how far it goes beyond the necessities of the argument for Dakota—

I think their course is clearly justifiable, but if there is anything wrong or unusual in it it is to be attributed to the neglect of Congress.

For three years they have been rapping at your door, and asking for the consent of Congress to form a constitution, and for admission into the Union; but their petitions have not been heeded, and have been treated with neglect. Not being able to be admitted in the way they have sought, they have been forced to take their own course, and stand upon their rights—rights secured to them by the Constitution and a solemn irrepealable ordinance (of 1787).

They have taken a census of the Territory; they have formed a constitution, elected their officers, and the whole machinery of a State government is ready to be put in operation; they are only awaiting your action. Having assumed this attitude they now demand admission as a matter of right; they demand it as an act of justice at your hands.

Are they now to be repelled, or to be told that they must retrace their steps and come into the Union in the way they first sought to do, but could not obtain the sanction of Congress?

In fear of the consequences of such a decision, I tremble at an act of such injustice.—Benton's Thirty Years' View, volume 1, page 629.

Mr. Buchanan's remarks are very pertinent to the case of Dakota. Having refused to give Dakota an enabling act, now that she has formed a constitution and submitted it to us, shall she be repelled and told to take a course which she would have willingly adopted if Congress had allowed her to do it?

Attention was called the other day by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to a decision reported in 5 Howard's Reports, the case of Scott vs. Jones, and to a dissenting opinion in the case of Mr. Justice McLean. I want to read an extract from Justice McLean's opinion:

Michigan was an organized Territory of the United States. Its governor, judges, and all other Territorial officers were in the discharge of their various functions; the sovereignty of the Union extended to it. Under these circumstances the people of Michigan assembled, by delegates, in convention, and adopted a constitution, and under it elected members of both branches of their Legislature, and governor and judges, and organized the State government. No serious objection need be made, in my judgment, to the assemblage of the people in convention to form a constitution, although it is the more regular and customary mode to proceed under the saction of an act of Congress. But until the State shall be admitted into the Union by act of Congress the Territorial government remains unimpaired.

I do not controvert the conclusion of the distinguished judge. Probably at the time he spoke, if we consider only those Territories that went through a Territorial form of organization, he was right in saying that an enabling act was the more usual form. It would scarcely be true now.

Mr. President, the case of California is an exceedingly instructive one. California had asked for a Territorial government, for some form of civil government, and Congress had denied it, or failed to provide it. California had only a military government. Brigadier-General Riley, then in command of the troops, was acting as governor, and H. W. Halleck, then a captain in the Army of the United States, as secretary of state. Congress having failed to provide a civil government for California, the President of the United States sent a gentleman to California to stimulate the people of that Territory to organize a State government for themselves, to suggest to them that they should do it. In pursuance of that suggestion a convention was called by proclamation of General Riley, attested by Captain Halleck as secretary of state, a convention was held, a constitution formed and submitted to Congress.

The people exercised their sovereign and ultimate right upon the suggestion of the President and formed a constitution not only without an enabling act but without even a preliminary Territorial organization—without any suggestion from Congress as to what should be the limits of the State if a State was to be organized.

William M. Gwin and John C. Frémont, as Senators, presented to Congress, in September, 1850, a memorial for admission into the Union. If it is worth while to discuss mere matters of phraseology, as the resolution of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] seemed to suggest, I call attention to that memorial, which opens as follows:

The undersigned, Senators and Representatives elect from the State of California, have the honor, in pursuance of the requirement in the constitution recently adopted by her people for her government as a State, to lay before your honorable bodies certified copies of said constitution, together with their credentials, and to request, in the name of the people of California, the admission of the State of California into the American Union.

There did not seem to be as much sensitiveness then as now upon the question of receiving a memorial from the people of a Territory who had initiated proceedings for a State organization. The message of President Taylor, transmitting this constitution to Congress, was very brief. He simply said:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith to the Senate, for the information of that body, an authenticated copy of the constitution of the State of California, received by me from Hon. William M. Gwin.

Z. TAYLOR.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 13, 1850.

In this connection there is an interesting bit of history, which was new to me and may be new to other Senators. It seems that the same suggestion that was made to the people of California, that they should organize a government for themselves, was also made by President Taylor to the people of New Mexico. Letters were written to the military governor there suggesting to him that he should support the people there in a movement to organize a civil government in New Mexico. It will be remembered that Texas claimed part of the territory now embraced within the organized Territory of New Mexico.

The governor of Texas sent into that region an agent with a view of organizing counties and establishing the control of the civil authorities of Texas there. When he got there he found that the military officer representing the United States was suggesting and forwarding a movement for a State organization. The result of that was a letter addressed by the governor of Texas to the President of the United States, which was answered by Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, after the death of President Taylor. I want to read simply an extract or two from what Mr. Webster said in defense of the course that was taken by the President. Senators will understand we had there no Territorial civil organization at all. It was a suggestion that the people, exercising their fundamental right, should organize for themselves without any enabling act of Congress a State government and submit it for the approval of Congress. Mr. Webster said:

In answer, therefore, to your first interrogatory, namely, whether Colonel Monroe, in issuing the proclamation referred to, acted under the orders of this Government, the President directs me to state that Colonel Monroe's proclamation appears to have been issued in pursuance or in consequence of an order or letter of instructions given by the late Secretary of War, under the authority of the late President, to Lieutenant-Colonel McCall. Of this order, which bears date on the 19th of November, 1849, your excellency was undoubtedly informed at the date of your letter. A full and accurate copy, however, is attached to this communication. Colonel McCall is therein instructed that if the people of New Mexico, for whom Congress had provided no government, should manifest a wish to take any steps to establish a government for themselves and apply for admission into the Union, it will be his duty and the duty of others with whom he is associated, not to thwart but to advance their wishes.

I read another extract:

The treaty, in perfect accordance with the proclamation of General Kearney, declared that the Mexicans remaining in this territory should be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to an enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution—

Quoting here, as Senators will see, the provision of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo—and, in the mean time, should be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

I read now this concluding extract. After saying to the governor of Texas that, of course, the proceedings taken were merely tentative; that no action taken by the people there could curtail the boundaries of Texas; that the question of the true boundary was a question for the courts or a question for settlement between the State of Texas and the Congress of the United States, he says:

Hence, the President regards the formation of this State constitution as a mere nullity. It may be regarded, indeed—

And I ask attention to this expression—

It may be regarded, indeed, as a petition to Congress to be admitted as a State; but until Congress shall grant the prayer of such petition, by legal enactments, it affects the rights of neither party. But as it is the right of all to petition Congress for any law which it may constitutionally pass, this people were in the exercise of a common right when they formed their constitution, with a view of applying to Congress for admission as a State; and as he thinks the act can prejudice no one, he feels bound to approve of the conduct of Colonel Monroe in issuing the proclamation.

The view taken by Mr. Webster was that the act of the people in forming a State constitution was a nullity, a nullity precisely in the sense that a bill passed by the Senate is a nullity until it passes the House and receives the signature of the President, a nullity not in the sense that it is not an efficient or necessary or appropriate act, but in the sense that it does not receive legal validity and force until Congress has ratified the action taken by the people. It is clear.

Mr. Webster says that it involves the right of petition and that it is perfectly competent for the people of any community in one of our organized Territories or in an unorganized Territory to propose to Congress the formation of a State and to submit a constitution under which they are willing to live. It is not disorderly nor disrespectful to ask Congress to ratify that which is in its beginning simply the exercise of the ultimate right of the people to assemble in convention and to ask of Congress the passage of any law affecting their interests.

Now, Mr. President, look at the case of Arkansas. The question of the right of the people of that State to initiate proceedings to form a State constitution and government as they did, without an enabling act, was very much discussed in Congress. Both of the Senators from Missouri voted for the admission of Arkansas, and defended the course taken by her people as a legitimate and proper one.

I do not think I need follow through the cases of the other States. But I will read what is said in the report of the committee as to the cases of Iowa and Florida:

The admission of Iowa and Florida was at first included in a single act of Congress, approved March 3, 1845 (5 Stats. L., 742). The people of these States had repeatedly memorialized Congress for admission to the Union, but no action was taken. The preamble of the act admitting them to the Union is as follows:

"Whereas the people of the Territory of Iowa did, on the 7th day of October, 1844, by a convention of delegates called and assembled for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government; and whereas the people of the Territory of Florida did, in like manner, by their delegates, on the 11th day of January, 1839, form for themselves a constitution and State government, both of which said constitutions are republican; and said conventions having asked the admission of their respective Territories into the Union as States on an equal footing with the original States:

"Be it enacted," &c.

It will be noticed that the constitution of Florida was formed in 1839, six years before her admission. This convention assembled under authority of an act of the Territorial Legislature passed February 2, 1838. There was not in the case of either State any authority from Congress for the holding of the constitutional convention that framed the constitution under which it was admitted. The act of Congress changed the boundaries of the State of Iowa, as defined in her constitution, and required the consent of the people to this change. This proposition was defeated at a popular election. A second convention, called by the Territorial Legislature, met and formed a new constitution in May, 1846, which was adopted by the people, and on December 28, 1846, an act of Congress admitting the State was passed.

I do not see how any one can affirm that the case of Dakota is not paralleled, not once but many times in the history of the admission of States. The precedents are stronger than the necessities of the case of Dakota. They do not go far beyond the demands of this bill. That being so, how is it that I still hear the Senator from Missouri say, "I deliberately assert that there is no such case on record in the United States as the people of Dakota have made for themselves?"

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator just there——

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to be enlivened by a question.

Mr. BUTLER. Not for the purpose of enlightening the Senator, for he is thoroughly enlightened on this question.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I said "enlivened," not enlightened.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like the Senator to state the precedents on which he relies to name the States which he claims as the precedents on which he relies.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has before him the report submitted by the committee in which all the precedents are stated. Now, let me return the question, if the Senator will allow me. Will he be good enough to indicate any particular in which the proceedings of the people of Dakota are without precedent?

Mr. BUTLER. Not now. I think I will do so to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I was in hopes the Senator would favor me by doing so now, as I have answered his question.

Mr. BUTLER. That was the reason why I asked the Senator to point out exactly the States on which he relies.

Mr. HARRISON. The States are all enumerated in the report much more particularly than in my argument.

Mr. BUTLER. I have read the report.

Mr. HARRISON. But I beg the Senator from South Carolina, as I am about to conclude this discussion, to state to me in what particulars the action of the people of Dakota differs from these precedents to which I have referred?

Mr. BUTLER. I will do that at the proper time. I am not prepared to do that now.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator give me a suggestion of one point or two?

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will give me the names of the States on which he relies, I will do so in the course of this debate.

Mr. HARRISON. I have already said to the Senator that the cases upon which I rely are the case of Tennessee, the case of Michigan, the case of California, the cases of Iowa and Florida, the case of Arkansas, and the case of Oregon. Now, will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I can not answer it now, because it would require very much more time than I can take at present.

Mr. HARRISON. I simply wanted a text from the Senator, a suggestion of some particular——

Mr. BUTLER. I shall satisfy the Senator in the course of the debate, I think.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know whether the Senator will or not.

Mr. BUTLER. Then he can not be satisfied.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know whether the Senator will or not. I desire now the Senator from South Carolina, or any other Senator, to suggest any particular in which the proceedings of the people of Dakota are without the line of the precedents to which I have referred. I ask it now because I do not desire to discuss this question again, and certainly it would be but common courtesy to make a suggestion of some particular. Ah, Mr. President, I can get none, none from any direction. I then conclude this discussion by again asking the Senators who represent the States of Tennessee, Arkansas, and Florida, States whose proceedings were certainly less orderly in many respects than those taken by the people of Dakota, what reason they can show why we should not give a favorable hearing to this petition of the people of Dakota for admission into the Union of the States? A sufficient area, a population entitling them to two members of Congress, a State already developed in its productions till it has surpassed many of the older States, a people who have shown, not simply in the provisions of their constitution, but in the conduct of their institutions under a Territorial form of government, their earnest attachment to the principles of the Federal Constitution, their devotion to the institutions of education and religion, their capacity to participate in the best work that remains for this American Government to accomplish for itself and for the people of the world—why is it they shall be met here, when in this respectful form they come to ask admission to the States of this Union, with a denial of their just claim?

Mr. President, I undertake to say that in the history of the admission of States it will be quite impossible for any one to produce a case where in all the elements necessary to make a State Dakota has been equaled by any State at the time it was admitted into the Union.

I leave now to the consideration of Senators this imperfect plea in behalf of a people whose just request is that they may be "permitted to reap the common benefits, share the common ills, and promote the common welfare as one of the United States of America."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from South Carolina yielding, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the Dakota bill the Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand that I have the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor for 2 o'clock to-morrow, when the bill will come up as the unfinished business. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal.

Mr. HATCH. I move by unanimous consent that the mere formal portion of the Journal relating to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions be omitted by the Clerk in his reading.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The remaining portion was then read, and the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was approved.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, laid before the House the following message from the President; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 16th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of proposed legislation providing for negotiations with the various tribes and bands of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota with a view to the improvement of their present condition.

It is requested that the matter may have early attention, consideration, and action by Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 25, 1886.

ELECTRICAL COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, also laid before the House the following message from the President; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of State, which is accompanied by the report of the United States electrical commission of the proceedings of the national conference of electricians, held at the city of Philadelphia, in the month of September, 1884.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 25, 1886.

AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, also laid before the House a bill (S. 200) to authorize the purchase of the Aqueduct Bridge or the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, D. C.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

NORTHERN CHEYENNES.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, also laid before the House a joint resolution (H. Res. 91) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana, returned from the Senate with amendments; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF THOMAS A. HENDRICKS.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution from the Senate:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States and for a number of years a distinguished member of this body.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be suspended in order that the eminent public services and the private virtues of the deceased may be appropriately commemorated.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the concurrent resolution just read for the present lie on the table; and further, that Tuesday next, after the reading of the Journal, shall be set apart for the consideration of resolutions touching the death of the late Vice-President of the United States.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

CATTLE CONVENTION.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I ask by unanimous consent that the memorial of the committee of the cattle convention be printed in the RECORD. It is not long.

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

ENLARGEMENT OF PHILADELPHIA MINT.

Mr. COLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the House of Representatives in what manner the United States Mint at Philadelphia could be enlarged by building upon the unoccupied grounds appertaining to the site of the present building, and to furnish information of the cost thereof and of the cost of the purchase of sufficient ground adjoining said building on the west if it be necessary to purchase more ground for the proposed said enlargement, so that the accommodations for the carrying on the business in the said mint may be so improved as to afford greater facilities than now exist therein.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. A few days ago, Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of some resolutions presented by myself, relating, among other things, to the removal of a tablet or inscription from the engine-room of the dry-dock at Norfolk, Va., some discussion was had, in the course of which I find it reported in the RECORD that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] made the following statement——

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Speaker, I will interrupt the gentleman by saying that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] is not here to-day, and, in any allusion to be made to him, I think it proper the gentleman should wait until his return.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, I am as solicitous as he possibly can be to observe every courtesy involved in such a matter; that I desire to say goes merely to the vindication of myself in a matter with which the presence of the gentleman from Virginia can have no possible connection. I have waited, I will also state, Mr. Speaker, a reasonable time for correction or contradiction of this statement. I desire to continue my statement of personal privilege.

Mr. CABELL. If no reference is to be made to my colleague [Mr. WISE] I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman will see the reference when I have made my statement. I do not intend to attack any gentleman in his absence by any statement I am about to make. The gentleman from Virginia used the following language:

In the brief time which is allotted to me I have opportunity to make only a statement of facts. I had hoped that the subject of this resolution would not have been discussed in this House until we had been informed by the Secretary of the Navy. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] on more occasions than one has sought to revive the passions and the prejudices of the war. Let us see how much of truth there is in the statements of this resolution.

The Secretary of the Navy is called upon to report to this House if any tablet has been destroyed at the Norfolk navy-yard which commemorates or commemorated the fact that the dry-dock at Portsmouth had been destroyed. I am glad of the opportunity to inform the gentleman from Maine that the dry-dock at Portsmouth never was destroyed. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, that statement, made upon the floor of the House by a gentleman who was put forward as the spokesman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has been widely copied throughout the country and has——

Mr. HERBERT. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HERBERT. The point of order I make is that the truth or falsity of an allegation of that kind is not a matter involving a question of personal privilege, such as entitles a gentleman to the privileges of the floor. Whether or not the allegation of Mr. WISE, the gentleman from Virginia, or the gentleman from Maine himself was correct in the statement is simply a matter of fact; and I do not understand that if the statement the gentleman has read was made by the gentleman from Virginia there was any intention on the part of that gentleman to reflect upon the personal veracity of the gentleman from Maine. It was a mere statement of fact, and not a reflection upon the gentleman. There is nothing in the way of a charge of any kind in the statement the gentleman from Maine has read; and therefore I submit that his remarks are out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the rules of the House——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Speaker of the House if it is not my privilege to state what I consider to be the question of privilege to which I rise?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That I am endeavoring to do, with the strictest and most careful attention to and respect for the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine that the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama is that so far the gentleman in his remarks has not disclosed any matter involving a question which, under the rules of the House, would entitle him to the privileges of the floor as a matter of right. It might or might not present a proper subject for a personal explanation with the consent of the House. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Alabama to make that point, but that the subject presented is not a matter of privilege.

Mr. HERBERT. My point of order is that the language the gentleman has read does not afford a matter out of which a question of privilege can grow. It must be made upon some point or other affecting the good name or character of a member in order to afford a basis for such a question. There is nothing whatever in the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia on which to base a question of personal privilege. There is nothing affecting the veracity of the gentleman from Maine or his character in any respect.

Mr. CABELL. I submit, Mr. Speaker, in addition to the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama, that a mere personal explanation the gentleman is endeavoring to make is not a subject which will entitle him to the privileges of the floor, but that it requires the unanimous consent of the House. In the absence of my colleague [Mr. WISE] I deem it my duty to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the statement of the gentleman from Maine as to the matter of privilege involved.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am endeavoring to make that. Am I not in order in stating the views which I entertain as to the propriety of rising to a question of personal privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order. The gentleman has a right to speak to the point of order, and has a right to show that he presents a question of privilege under the rules of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is just what I was attempting to do when I was interrupted.

The statement which I have read, Mr. Speaker, from the RECORD has been widely telegraphed over the country, and has been made the subject of very severe animad versions upon my intelligence and veracity. I do not exaggerate in saying that quite a number of publications have assumed that the statement which I have read convicted me before the House and before the country of having trifled with the House, or having at least connived at a gross falsification of what ought to be a matter of familiar history. I have risen here to-day as a member of this House, under these circumstances, believing from such examination as I have been able to make of the rules of the House, as well as the usages which govern bodies of this character, and I may say associations of gentlemen everywhere, that I would be entitled, as a matter of personal privilege, to cite here in the House and have placed in the RECORD some brief citations from the public records of the country——

Mr. HERBERT (interrupting). I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). Stating the facts——

Mr. HERBERT. I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is discussing the point of order, and endeavoring, as the Chair understands, to show that a matter of personal privilege is involved.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I decline to yield.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to have a ruling of the Chair upon my right as a member of this House, under the circumstances which I have stated, to cite here in vindication of my veracity, in vindication of my good faith as a member of the House, in vindication of the truthfulness of the representations made by me, and to have printed in the RECORD some brief and pertinent citations from the public records of this country setting forth the fact of the destruction of the Norfolk navy-yard by the rebels on the 10th and 11th days of May, 1862——

Mr. HERBERT. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I believe I have the floor under the ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. HERBERT. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] rises to make a point of order, as the Chair understands, on what the gentleman from Maine is now saying.

Mr. BOUTELLE. He makes the point of order on what I am now stating?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes; on what the gentleman is now stating.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is this a new point of order, or a section of the old one?

Mr. HERBERT. It is the same old point.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to know, under the recognition which the Speaker gave me, and the permission he accorded me to state the question upon which I desire a ruling, whether I have not a right to complete my statement.

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt the gentleman from Maine has a right to discuss the question of order; but the gentleman from Alabama now rises for the purpose, as he states, of making a point of order on what the gentleman from Maine is now stating.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will that deprive me of the privilege of completing my statement on the former point of order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine can discuss the point of order.

Mr. HERBERT. I make the point of order that it is perfectly clear to the Speaker and the House that the purpose of the gentleman from Maine is to introduce some proof or other here as to whether he or the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] who is now absent was correct in the statement made on a previous occasion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is——

Mr. HERBERT. I submit, Mr. Speaker, I have the floor on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine rises to a point of order on what the gentleman from Alabama is stating. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I submit the gentleman from Alabama is simply restating his former point of order and not making any new point. He is discussing a question upon which the Speaker has ruled and on which the Speaker gave me the floor.

Mr. HERBERT. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in violation of the rules of the House the gentleman from Maine is attempting to discuss before this House a mere question of fact which does not in any manner involve his character and which is not a matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not understood the gentleman from Maine so far to propose to make any statement as to the matter of fact or introduce any official records in discussing the point of order. But the gentleman from Maine is endeavoring to show, as the Chair understands, that he has a right to take the floor as a matter of privilege; and if that claim be sustained, then to introduce certain matters of fact.

Mr. HERBERT. But the gentleman from Maine himself in so many words states that what he proposes to do is to ask the privilege of citing here and having printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD certain public records of the country which will show he is correct in his statements made heretofore.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Maine proposes to put those statements of fact in the RECORD unless the Chair shall rule upon the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama that the gentleman from Maine has the right to make this statement as a matter of privilege. The gentleman from Maine is contending he has the right to address the House as a matter of privilege for the purpose, if he is permitted to do that, of presenting certain facts.

Mr. HERBERT. Can the gentleman from Maine in discussing the point of order introduce what he claims to be a statement of facts?

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that while the gentleman from Maine is discussing the question of order, that is to say, while he is discussing the question as to whether or not he has the right to occupy the floor as a matter of privilege, he can not introduce these records or state the facts further than is necessary as a part of his argument to show that he has a right to state certain facts hereafter when declared to be entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAMMOND. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Can the gentleman from Maine under the guise of arguing a question of order make the speech for which he has risen and which the House is trying to stop him from making, because contrary to our rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks all the gentleman from Maine can now do properly is to discuss the question of order and to show that, as a matter of privilege, he has the right to reply to the statement made on the floor by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. KING. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KING. Will not the speech of the gentleman from Maine appear in the RECORD all the same?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair has simply ruled that the gentleman from Maine has a right, as he now occupies the floor, to discuss the question of order and nothing else.

Mr. KING. Will not his speech appear just the same?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is entitled at this time to discuss only the question of order. He will proceed to discuss that question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I submit that all I have attempted to do to-day has been to submit, in my imperfect way, my views as to what constitutes my privilege in this matter, in order that the Speaker may inform me whether I entertain the correct view or not. In continuation of the statement which I was attempting to make when I was so persistently interrupted by the gentlemen with their points of order—points of order which were not made so numerously when the statement I am referring to was made on the floor of the House the other day—I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that it seems to me that it is clearly within my privilege as a member to have printed in the RECORD such brief and pertinent citations from the public records of this country, setting forth the fact of the destruction of the navy-yard at Norfolk by the rebels in 1861 and 1862, as I have upon my desk in excerpts from the official reports of the major-general commanding that department at the time.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HAMMOND. My point is, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] can not do that indirectly which he can not do directly; that until the Speaker shall hold that his remarks are privileged he has no right to state anything whatever about those records, and that it is a violation of the privilege given him to argue a question of order to proceed in the manner in which he has been proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may misunderstand the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], and if so he desires to be corrected; but the Chair understands that gentleman simply to argue that he ought to have a right, and that he has a right under the rules, to present certain historical facts as he claims them to be. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Maine to offer to present those facts now on the question of the point of order; but the Chair can not see very well how the gentleman could inform the Chair and the House as to what his purpose is without stating what it is that he desires to do. The gentleman does not propose to put these records in now.

Mr. HAMMOND. No, Mr. Speaker, he does not propose to put the records in now; but he states what he says is contained in those records. In other words he says: "I have a fact here, to be proven by a record;" and it is wholly immaterial to him whether that record gets in or only his speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order, and I desire simply to say this: The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] asked the Chair whether he had a right——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] asked the question whether he had a right to introduce and put upon record certain historical facts, and now he proposes to go on and state what those historical facts are.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the Chair, that if there be any point of time at which the presiding officer can determine that this statement should be excluded that point has been reached when the gentleman from Maine says, as he now does, that he desires put into the RECORD certain historical statements. It does not matter what those historical statements are, whether they go to show the one thing or the other; taken in connection with everything that the gentleman from Maine has said, it is very clear that this is not a matter of personal privilege. Whatever those statements may be, whatever they may show, by whomsoever they may be made, they can not be, in connection with what has been said here by the gentleman from Maine, a matter of personal privilege which he would be entitled to state here.

The SPEAKER. That is the question which the Chair has to decide, the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] will confine himself to a statement going to show that he has a right to occupy the floor, as a matter of personal privilege, to respond to the statement which he has read as having been made here the other day by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE], and of course the gentleman will understand that in discussing that question of order he has no right to discuss the question whether or not the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was correct or incorrect. The gentleman is now simply claiming the right to show hereafter that that statement was incorrect.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I trust it is unnecessary for me to state that my most sincere desire is to keep not only within the letter of the Speaker's rulings, but entirely within the spirit of his administration of the order of this House; and if I shall err in the slightest degree it will be from inadvertence and not from intention. I have not been a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress without learning to rely implicitly upon the rectitude and integrity of the administration of the order of this House [applause]; and I am not here to-day to ask any exceptional favor or to be given any latitude whatever beyond that which the Speaker of this House shall deem to be my just privilege.

Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of undertaking in any manner of subterfuge, I had no desire to get before this House in any covert manner the official records to which I refer relating to the facts of the destruction of this navy-yard. I have those official reports here, including the report of the major-general of the department, including the report of the flag officer of the United States Navy commanding the squadron, who took possession of the navy-yard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that upon the question of order the gentleman from Maine has no right to go beyond a mere statement of the grounds on which he claims the privilege of the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I was intending and desiring to say that while I had those official reports on my desk, and desire to read them, I shall not attempt to read them, I shall not attempt to put before the House the details of their subject-matter fortifying the statements which I make, unless the Speaker of this House shall rule, as I sincerely hope he will (although I shall bow with entire submission and grace to whatever decision the Chair may arrive at), that as a matter of justice, as a matter of propriety, as a matter of the very highest personal privilege that can pertain to the performance of a member's duty on this floor, when a statement has appeared in the RECORD and been telegraphed broadcast to the country for four or five days, a member shall be permitted to bring to bear upon that statement in vindication of his own integrity citations from the public records of the officers of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the rule of the House defining questions of privilege.

The Clerk read as follows:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

The SPEAKER. It happens almost every day in the discussions on the floor that members differ in their statements respecting facts, especially historical facts such as the one involved in this case, and unless there is some improper motive attributed, some purpose to deceive or impose upon the House, or some reflection upon the representative character of a member, the Chair can not see that any question of privilege is involved. It frequently happens that gentlemen rise for the purpose of making "personal explanations" with the consent of the House, but those are not, technically speaking, under the rules of the House, matters of privilege. The Chair has not been able to see from what has been read by the gentleman from Maine that the gentleman from Virginia in his remarks imputed to him any improper motive or purpose whatever; but the two gentlemen differed simply upon a question of fact. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HAMMOND. I suggest that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] appeal from the decision of the Chair and see how unanimously the House will sustain the Chair.

Mr. BURROWS. In view of the anxiety manifested on the other side of the House to get at the facts, I hope the gentleman from Maine will ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It will not be granted in the absence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Nor in his presence, either. [Laughter.]

Mr. CABELL. Then we should thank some of you gentlemen who make the opposition.

The SPEAKER. This matter is disposed of. There is no question now before the House.

Mr. CABELL. If the gentleman from Maine seeks a new trial, let him wait till the prosecutor is present.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of the standing and select committees for reports to go to the appropriate Calendars.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY, ETC.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Pacific Railroads have considered the accompanying resolution asking information from the Secretary of the Interior in regard to contracts entered into between the subsidized railroads and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and any and all contracts entered into by such railroads with the Pacific Steamship Company, and have instructed me to report the same back with the recommendation that the same be adopted.

The resolution accompanying the report was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to furnish this House with copies of any and all contracts or leases which are to be found on file in said Department between the Southern Pacific Company and any and every railroad or railroads to which land grants were made or which received any subsidies from the United States; also a copy of the charter of incorporation of the Southern Pacific Company; also, all and every contract or contracts on file between the Pacific Steamship Company and any and every land grant or subsidized railroad company or companies.

The question being taken, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. THROCKMORTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HOUSE DIGEST.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to submit a privileged report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted on the 6th instant, "that 200 additional copies of the Digest for the present session be printed and bound for distribution to the committees and officers of the House and heads of the Departments and bureaus," have instructed me to return the same and to recommend the passage of the resolution. The cost of the same is reported by the Public Printer to be $153.30.

The resolution accompanying the report was read, as follows:

Resolved, That 200 additional copies of the Digest for the present session be printed and bound for distribution to the committees and officers of the House and heads of Departments and Bureaus.

The question being taken, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to introduce a resolution which has for its object no partisan purpose.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now proceed to call the standing and select committees of the House for reports for reference.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BELLAIRE.

Mr. CANDLER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3764) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Bellaire; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MONUMENT TO THE LATE GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. VIELE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1600) for the erection and completion of a monument to the memory of the late General Ulysses S. Grant in the city of New York; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAINT LOUIS AND SAN FRANCISCO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. PEEL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 105) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant the right of way for a railroad and telegraph line through the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, and for other purposes;" which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

E. P. M'NEAL, OF HARDEMAN COUNTY, TENNESSEE.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 4839) for the relief of E. P. McNeal, of Hardeman County, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAN CLEMENTE LAND CLAIM.

Mr. HALSELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 4840) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THEODORE W. TALLMADGE.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1905) for the relief of Theodore W. Tallmadge; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IGNACIO CHAVES AND OTHERS.

Mr. OSBORNE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 218) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TRES ALAMOS.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3216) to confirm the title to that certain land grant "Tres Alamos," in Arizona Territory; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, the Committee on Accounts was discharged from the further consideration of a resolution of inquiry in reference to delay in adjudication of invalid pensions; and the same were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE, GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés of the Government Printing Office; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RETIREMENT OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER. The call of standing and select committees for reports for reference has been completed. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at 1 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m. The pending question is the bill (H. R. 339) authorizing the voluntary retirement of certain officers of the United States Navy who have rendered conspicuous service in battle or who have served thirty years in the Navy, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, I desire before going any further to correct a statement made by me yesterday in the heat of debate. I find by the RECORD this morning that I said some of the officers on the Navy Register had been in the war of 1812. Of course that statement is erroneous.

It is evident, sir, to the members of the Naval Committee that the House has been somewhat stampeded with regard to this bill. An erroneous impression prevails, from the speeches of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], both of whom inveighed against the aristocratic tendency of the Navy and appealed to the spirit of economy, but certainly with a misunderstanding of the laws which regulate the retired-list. Under these plausible but specious arguments it is no wonder this stampede has occurred. Now, in the first place, Mr. Speaker, I think the members of this House should understand that the retired-list is a matter of law. It is not something which the Navy Department has invented. It is not a custom which has grown up in the service, but it is a matter of statute law.

There is another erroneous impression which I think prevails in the minds of many members of the House; that is, that every officer of the Navy who has served so many years is retired. No officer in the Navy can be retired until he has attained a certain rank and reached a certain age. I saw the drift of this yesterday when the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] in a spirit of friendship asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] what was the total salary of a lieutenant of the Navy on the retired-list. Now, a lieutenant in the Navy can not be put on the retired-list, and this bill, if passed without amendment (and amended, I am justified in saying, it will be), would only apply to a small percentage of the Official Register of the Navy, probably only rear-admirals, some six in number. If this is not so in its present shape we can so amend it. Suppose this House does not pass this bill, will you economize in the public Treasury? Will you render the Navy more efficient? Will you reform by inaction? You simply push aside the whole subject and go on paying the present list. Let us hear what reform the objectors to this propose.

If you do not pass this bill you do not take off a man from the pay-list of the Navy. Fail to pass this bill, and the "dead wood" of the Navy, alluded to by my colleague from Illinois on the committee, remains on the Naval Register without a chip being removed and without the saving of a dollar to the public Treasury. What you do when you have passed this bill is this:

You take the men off the Naval Register whose inability is of a subtle kind, that can not possibly be reached by a board of examiners, reduce their present salaries, and you make an upward move all along the line on the Register for the benefit of the whole service. You lighten the top-heavy Naval Register and send the officers to active duty away from the hotels and reception-rooms of the capital. You enable the people to get real naval service for their hard-earned taxes. You let free the stagnant dam and give life and motion to the waters. You make seamen and naval experts out of ambitious young and middle-aged men who will otherwise become bureau drones or ball-room ornaments.

Now, my distinguished and most excellent friend from Ohio, as I was about retiring from the debate last night, fired a Parthian arrow by asking me the question, Can you educate these men better at Annapolis or in a vessel at sea? My excellent friend from Ohio, I am well aware, is a most gallant and first-class cross-roads sailor [laughter], and he knows enough to know that a man must be a good scientist, as well as a sailor, to navigate one of these powerful monitors or maneuver in a naval combat an enormous ironclad with sixteen inches of compound armor on her sides. Does not the gentleman know, being an experienced nautical man as he is a great financier, that a sailor man is not always sailing? Does not he remember the lines of the comic opera, that the sailors do not so wieldly and zealously love the sea as some people seem to imagine?

To lay aloft in a howling breeze
May tickle a landsman's taste,
But the happiest hours a sailor sees
Is when he's down
At an inland town,
With his Nancy on his knees, yeo-ho!
And his arm around her waist!

Now, seriously speaking, the Naval Committee have given to this bill very careful attention. They have endeavored to examine the case fully from all its standpoints, and I want to state right here that it is impossible to figure up to a dollar what this will cost. You would have to get up a lot of probability tables like those used by the life insurance companies, as to whether if the yellow fever breaks out down South and the cholera up North how much a man's widow is to get under these and certain other conditions and all of that sort of thing. It is impossible to know what cost it will involve beyond approximating it or to know who will be retired; but it is safe to assume that there will be but a very small number of the higher grades of officers who will care to retire. And of those who are unfitted for the service, as I have said before, their inability or unfitness is exceedingly difficult to reach and determine by an examining board. Therefore pass this bill and you will put new vigor into the Navy; you will put youthful blood into the personnel of those who are its officers. A new navy must be built. The people of this country are very much interested in the question of the establishment of a new navy as much as in any great question of the day. Let us have useful, energetic, and able men to manage a new navy commensurate with our necessities, our dignity, our trade, and our rights in foreign waters, as well as our defense at home.

As to the question, Can you not get rid of the "dead wood" in some other way, I repeat again that it is a difficult subject to deal with in any other manner than by legislating them off in an honorable way. If there was a civil pension-list, which God forbid, I reverently say, and we attempted to retire some of our excellent statesmen from the public service, what a difficulty we would have to contend with.

It would be difficult to determine exactly where a man's qualifications ended and where his disqualifications began. After you get together a number of the august doctors to look into the question of his physical capacity, and after putting their wise heads together they may report that, though he has run through the dangers of Washington boarding-houses and cold tea for a period of twenty years, his stomach is still all right, and as to mental condition, that if you read one of his speeches you will find that his mental abilities, so far as the use of words is concerned, are fairly preserved. How then are you going to reject him? But a more general and abler expert might find that there was a degree of incapacity in that the subject was such an inveterate hobby-rider, unreasonable theorist, with distorted local vision, or Presidential aspirations, or love of applause, as to be disqualified to deal with practical questions of legislation in a practical and common-sense way.

I yield the remainder of the time to my colleague on the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I believe there are thirty minutes remaining of the time of the committee. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the debate on yesterday afternoon upon the pending measure has taken the course which its opponents have given it upon the floor of the House. The committee, nor any member of it, so far as I am informed, did not intend that it should operate as a special pension list in the ordinary and usually understood meaning of the phrase. The great and the only object of the committee in authorizing the report of the bill was to present to the House a most important measure, which they believed to be demanded in the interest of reform and efficiency in the Navy. A reformation and an efficiency to be of any value must apply as well to the character of its personnel as to the material of which our vessels are to be built and of which they are to be armored. A vessel, however well built and armored, if commanded by inefficient officers, be they ever so brave and patriotic, would be almost valueless in time of war; and it is equally true with reference to the officers, were they ever so skillful, courageous, and experienced, if the vessels given them to command did not answer to the exigency of the times.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us examine the bill critically but fairly, and anticipate, if we can, what will be the result should it become a law with the amendments which the committee have agreed to propose to the House. These amendments are, first, to strike out that portion of the bill which authorizes the officer to apply for retirement upon the ground of "conspicuous conduct in battle," and also the addition of a clause which will guard the bill from becoming a means through which injustice may be done the Government. These changes I favor, and when made will render the bill as perfect and as acceptable to the House as can be done. As to the propriety of these amendments there is entire harmony among the members of the committee. To deal wisely with this measure we must first consider the laws now in force and under which naval officers may be dismissed or retired. It is well understood that no naval officer can in time of peace be dismissed from service except upon and in pursuance of the sentence of a court to that effect or in commutation thereof. As to retirements, I find the following statute in force:

SEC. 1443. When any officer of the Navy has been forty years in the service of the United States he may be retired from active service by the President upon his own application.

SEC. 1444. When any officer below the rank of vice-admiral is sixty-two years old he shall, except in the case provided in the next section, be retired from active service.

SEC. 1445. The two preceding sections shall not apply to any lieutenant-commander, lieutenant, lieutenant of the junior grade, ensign, passed assistant surgeon, passed assistant paymaster, passed assistant engineer, assistant surgeon, assistant paymaster, or assistant engineer, and such officers shall not be placed upon the retired-list, except on account of physical or mental disability.

In addition to the foregoing, I find an act of Congress bearing date February 14, 1885, which permits an enlisted man in the Navy who has served as such thirty years in the Marine Corps of the United States to voluntarily retire, receiving 75 per cent. of the pay and allowances of the rank upon which he was retired.

Now, this gross and incomprehensible anomaly is presented: those officers of ranks higher than those mentioned in section 1445 may be retired upon their own application after serving the term specified in section 1443 or reaching the age prescribed in section 1444, and the enlisted men of the Marine Corps may also be voluntarily retired under the act of February 14, 1885; yet these officers who come within the provisions of section 1445, however old they may be or however long the period of their service, can not avoid the active duties of their profession except by resignation or dismission by a court-martial or be placed upon the retired-list, except on account of physical or mental disability.

If there be any other mode, I have not been able, after careful search and diligent inquiry, to ascertain what the mode is. Saying nothing respecting the injustice of these distinctions, which can neither be palliated nor denied, I come to the influence they exercise upon the personnel of the Navy. I have been told by high authority that there are many of the officers mentioned in section 1445 who are well-stricken in years, and, though they have rendered honorable and faithful service, yet because of their age and for other reasons that need not be mentioned they are wholly unfit to be placed in command of our best and stanchest cruisers. They have not kept up with the times. Their deportment is in every respect honorable and has been at no time subject to investigation.

I would not disparage these gentlemen, but it is no injustice when I say that many of them have failed to maintain that degree of enterprise, spirit, and activity which is so essentially necessary in naval affairs, when almost every day is fraught with the greatest changes and improvements in the building of vessels, in the manufacture of armaments, and in the invention of those appliances which constitute the make-up of the cruiser and the monitor of the present day. They have, perhaps involuntarily, been left behind, and some of them—I will not say many—are hinderances to the advancement of their juniors in the service but their superiors in genius, activity, and devotion to duty. Such officers are upon the rolls. They do nothing that will subject them to court-martial, nor are they so physically or mentally infirm as will allow their retirement because of such disqualifications. They draw their pay, yet they do not, and they can not, render such service as the Government should have at the hands of all its officers.

As was well said by my colleague on the committee [Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois], such officers constitute "the dead wood" of the Navy. The purpose of the measure upon which we are deliberating is to remove this decaying and decayed timber in an honorable way, and in its stead to substitute material that can successfully meet every emergency that may arise in the annals of human affairs. This, to my mind, appears practical. It is also as economical a method by which to secure a live, an active, an enterprising, and an able personnel as can be devised without doing an injustice to brave and honorable gentlemen, none the less so because they can not meet the demands that are upon them.

In a conversation with an officer of high rank, but a few days since he remarked that the present system would not successfully stand the test of a sixty days' war with a first-class naval power; that our system was entirely different from that maintained by England, or France, or Spain, or Germany, or Italy; that here the principle of "selection" did not obtain, and that the great and the only struggle for advancement to the topmost round in the ladder of promotion was the conte-that existed between the stomach and the mind. In other words, he said that the man who had the best stomach and took the best care of his physique was almost certain to live the longest, and thus secure the highest and most coveted prize in the service.

And in a conversation with a third gentleman of the naval service he said, without specifying individuals, that there were many to be affected by the pending bill who ought not to be intrusted with the command of a first-class merchant vessel. There are, I am informed, eight hundred and fifty-one officers upon the active-list who are included within the limitations of section 1445. Of course I do not characterize all of these officers, or the larger portion of them, as inefficient. I have not been advised as to the inefficiency of any particular officer, but it is "abroad in the land," it is "a matter of common talk," that inefficiency in no small degree does exist.

Mr. REAGAN. Will my colleague permit me to ask a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. If not incapacitated, why retire these officers to make room for others?

Mr. SAYERS. Because, though upon examination it might be found that they were neither physically nor mentally incapacitated for service, yet by reason of their age and of infirmaties, not amounting to absolute disqualification, they would not be such material as should constitute a part of the personnel of an efficient navy. They would continue in the service only to be a clog upon the advancement of others of ability, energy, and enterprise. I ask my colleague if he would support a bill for the retirement of such officers?

Mr. REAGAN. I would not support a bill to allow any man pay for doing nothing.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman does not answer the question.

I very much regret the position assumed on yesterday by my colleague on this floor in reference to the policy of the pending bill. I feel that he has not viewed it in all its features, nor has he thought of some of the consequences to result if this bill becomes a law. I can not believe that if he had been familiar with the laws pertaining to the Navy that he would have adopted the line of argument, or rather of denunciation, which he pursued yesterday in reference to the measure.

Has it ever occurred to him that section 1445 became a law, in part if not altogether, in 1870? Can he recall the political condition of the country at the time and for a few years thereafter? Let him read the three sections I have quoted in the light of the lurid events of the years in which they became laws, and then he will, perhaps, discover that the limitations of section 1445 then had a meaning—that meaning being to carefully guard the avenues of naval promotions so that for many years, at all events, there might be no danger of advancement by a graduate at the Naval Academy from the South to high naval rank.

Does my friend and colleague remember how, at the Democratic State convention in 1872, we gathered around him and bore him upon our shoulders to the president's chair, and what hearty acclamations greeted him from us all as he rose to address the convention? Why was such high honor conferred upon him? Why was he greeted with such warm and heartfelt salutation? The answer is plain. It was because he was a proscribed man, and we were anxious to give him demonstration that our deepest sympathies and strongest friendship were with him. It was a proud day for us to thus honor a man because he was so situated.

But how is it to-day with my friend and colleague? We find him here denouncing a bill which, if it becomes a law, will in its effects destroy the limitations of section 1445 and render easy and practicable the promotion of graduates from the Naval Academy. The young men of the South will then have an opportunity to once again enter the naval service of their country in the full confidence that by industry, by enterprise, and by exemplary deportment they will be able to attain the highest rewards in the gift of the Government.

As long as section 1445 shall continue to be in force so long will the avenues to naval promotion be practically closed to the young men of the South. Already have more than a hundred young men—instructed and supported by the Government—after having completed a full course with honor to themselves and to the entire satisfaction of those in authority, been discharged from the service because there were no vacancies to be supplied. And this will continue to occur each year.

Very many of these graduates are from the South. They are full to overflowing with an honorable and a patriotic ambition to enter the naval service of their country. They have successfully prepared themselves for a brilliant career, which seemed opened to them upon their admission into the Academy. But, to their bitter disappointment, they found that section 1445 of the Revised Statutes, in its practical operation, presented an insurmountable obstacle to their further advancement, and they have been discharged.

I regret that my colleague will not give his strong assistance to secure the passage of a bill that will open up the avenues to naval preferment, so that the young men of the South may have a living chance to enroll their names among the great captains that have conferred honor and renown upon the American name.

I am, Mr. Speaker, for the young men of the country, and for that reason I support this bill. I care nothing about details. Let it be amended to suit the desires of gentlemen. The thing I want worst of all is to improve the personnel of the Navy and to admit the young men of every section of our country upon an equal footing to an honorable competition for the highest honors that are to be gained in the naval service.

In some manner, I care not how, do away with the limitations of section 1445 and a great difficulty will be removed. But if these limitations shall continue, then the "dead timber" in the Navy will continue to prevent its reform and efficiency, and there is not a being within this Hall, from the oldest to the youngest, that will live to see a young man graduating from the South at the Naval Academy since the war attain the rank of captain in the American Navy.

But repeal these limitations—through this bill or otherwise, I care not how—and youth, energy, enterprise, patriotism, and ambition will assert their way; and should war unhappily occur and our ships move out to battle, there will be found upon the quarter-deck of every vessel men from the East and from the West, from the North and from the South, with sword in hand and contesting one with another as to who can best serve a common country and beneath a common flag.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] has fifteen minutes left.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in introducing this bill I had no greater interest in it than every other member of Congress upon this floor.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] whether he intends to move to close debate?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I do.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I hope the House will not permit that to be done.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I think some gentleman should be allowed to speak on the other side.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reply to some of the points that have been presented here.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I decline to be interrupted, Mr. Speaker. If the motion that I shall present to the House is voted down, gentlemen who desire to be heard will have an opportunity.

This measure is no more mine than it is the measure of every man in this country who has the good of the naval service at heart. It is not my measure, and gentlemen who support it are conferring no special favor upon me, but are looking alone to the good of our common country. A bill which can not stand discussion and that light of reason which discussion throws upon every measure is not fit to be passed by Congress. A committee may have a bill before them and may investigate it as carefully as they can, giving it their most earnest attention, yet when discussion occurs in the House defects may be disclosed in the measure which were not discovered in committee. In passing upon a measure of such importance as this it is right and proper that every possible defect should be pointed out and, if possible, remedied; for we are seeking no special advantage for any class of men; we are seeking only to do right, to find some method by which we can advance the interests of the naval service.

If the bill had proceeded to a vote this morning, there was an amendment which I intended to offer on my own account; that is, to strike out the provision in the bill which would allow an officer to retire on account of conspicuous gallantry. That provision should be stricken out, for the reason that, upon investigation, it is found that the language is too indefinite, and that it would be impossible in practice to determine the men who would be entitled to its benefit. There are some other objections to which my attention has been called by a member of the House who has not yet spoken, a member who has the good of the naval service at heart, and is not bound up by such prejudices as disclosed themselves here yesterday. For these reasons, sir, before I leave the floor, I shall move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, in order that it may be perfected and the defects which have been suggested remedied.

I am not moved to this course by the retchings and seasickness displayed here by the illustrious storm-tossed mariner of the mountain district of Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] [laughter]; nor am I moved by the communistic doctrine advocated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], a doctrine which could only be properly characterized by terms which it would not be parliamentary to use upon this floor. "Aristocracy!" Fear of establishing an aristocracy, because a government provides a respectable means of retirement for men who have given the best years of their lives to its service! Such a provision strikes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] as a step toward aristocracy, and therefore as something which should be frowned upon by every lover of his country. I have no doubt the gentleman reflects with great pleasure upon his own distinguished and illustrious services, not only here but in other places. I have no doubt that, basing a proper aspiration, or a proper desire for advancement, not only upon his ability but upon his own illustrious service to his country, he would like to fill a higher than a Cabinet position. Bids for votes by denouncing the heroes of the country, by denominating them "aristocrats," and talking about "the privileged classes" and the "down-trodden people," the gentleman will find are wholly ineffective; for around these heroes for many years has clustered the love of fifty millions of people, and that they shall be properly provided for and supported the people are determined to see.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman mean to make that sort of a speech, and then close debate and prevent reply to it?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. If it is any satisfaction to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] I will yield him five minutes now.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like to have the other four minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. I prefer not to occupy the time of the gentleman. I simply appeal to his sense of honor whether it is honorable or fair to indulge in that sort of argument without allowing a chance of replying to it.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. The gentleman has had an opportunity to make his speech.

Mr. REAGAN. And I neither reflected on any one nor insulted any one.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I assure the gentleman I had no intention of insulting him.

Mr. REAGAN. Then the gentleman has a queer way of using language.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I simply meant—and that I have a parliamentary right to do—to denounce the doctrines advocated by the gentleman. I used him and his life and eminent services to illustrate the unsoundness and fallacy of his own doctrines, not with the intention of insulting him or casting any reflection, but by way of illustrating the point, knowing that his own services have been so distinguished that he was a proper mark to set up for illustrating the point.

I think it proper, in order that justice may be done (and under the rules there is no opportunity at present for complete debate of this question), that this bill should be recommitted, to be brought in again in such a shape that every gentleman here will have an opportunity to be heard fully and completely upon it.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman yield to me two minutes?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I will.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say of the bill now under discussion that it is liable to some of the objections which have been pointed out, and to another objection more serious, perhaps, than any which has yet been adverted to upon the floor. Therefore the committee have decided that it ought to be recommitted; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] will make that motion before he takes his seat. I sincerely hope the House will vote to reconsider the bill and to stop this debate, which I fear is becoming personal, and I for one very much regret the turn which it has taken. This is all I desire to say, except that the committee, when it has perfected this bill and brought it back, will not undertake to have it voted upon until there shall have been the fullest and freest discussion upon it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield five minutes to me?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. No, sir; I have not time now.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then, give me three minutes.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will get an hour when the bill comes up again.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman has some time yet before calling for a vote on this question.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I will yield the gentleman two minutes; that is all I have time to yield.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is only time enough to enable me to say that this is as good an opportunity to dispose of this bill as we are likely to have. I am not so well informed on it as some of my friends here. I concede that my excellent friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] who lives nearer the salt water than I do ought to be better informed on naval matters than I am, on the theory of the tall boy at school who, when asked who made him, said he did not know; and when a smaller boy answered that God made him, and the teacher said to the larger boy that he ought to be ashamed that this little boy knew more than he did, the larger boy replied that it had not been so long since he was made, and therefore he ought to remember it better. So my friend from New Jersey, who lives nearer the salt water than I do, ought to know more about guns and ships and naval affairs.

The question here is, ought we, in order to get rid of a dozen or so of men in the Navy, who are said to encumber the Naval Register, to pass a law which practically carries to the retired-list all those who have reached the age of fifty-one or fifty-two years? This bill ought to be styled, Mr. Speaker, a bill to limit the service of officers and provide places for more officers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I now move to recommit this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the House to grant me ten minutes to reply to the gentleman from Illinois. I think, in justice, I am entitled to this.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I have no objection, if it will not interfere with my right under the rule to move to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The hour under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] will expire in three minutes; but the hour for the consideration of this bill will not expire for thirty minutes. If the gentleman from Illinois states that he withholds now his motion to recommit, with the understanding that he may be recognized at the proper time to make the motion, the Chair will so understand.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I have no objection to that arrangement, and will yield the floor for the purpose of giving the gentleman from Texas the opportunity he desires.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] has seen proper to characterize my remarks on yesterday and those he alluded to on a former day as "communistic." I do not know the dictionary which he has studied, nor the use he proposes to make of words; but I do know that this Government was administered for the whole period from its organization down to twenty years ago with no law on the statute-books for the payment of men for doing nothing.

Were all the Presidents and all the Congresses for the first sixty or eighty years of the existence of the Government of the United States communists? If they were then class me with that kind of communists. I think they were in the sense I am held to be a communist. I think they were men animated by that spirit of patriotism which meant to be just in all things. I think they were men animated with a purpose to extend no privilege to one man they did not extend to all. I think they respected the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and of the constitutions of the various States. They believed there is no power under our system of government to take property from one citizen and give it to another without adequate consideration; that there is no power to take property from the private citizen beyond what is taken in taxation for the support of Government, except for public use, and then only after just compensation therefor. They were a class of men who never dreamt or thought of establishing a government with an official class to be fed and supported off the labor of others who had not been as fortunate as themselves.

The gentleman alluded to what I said about the soldiers. Now, sir, he was sadly mistaken in his reference. I said nothing about the soldiers which was not honorable to them. I said, sir, that I was for pensioning every one who was under the law entitled to a pension, and for pensioning every widow of every soldier who fell in the service of his country, but that I was opposed to that scramble which went on here by political gamblers to make political capital by trading off the money of the Treasury for votes. Perhaps that is communistic. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I am afraid we have departed so far from the practices and doctrines of a republic, so far from the early precedents of the Government, that it has reached that point a man is almost considered a crank if he refers to the Constitution or practices of our fathers. We have gone into a different political atmosphere. We have gone into officialism in creating a class to be maintained out of the public Treasury.

Why, sir, to-day we have hundreds of supernumerary officers in both the Army and the Navy. Many of them on the retired-list are younger and stouter than I am to-day, living off other people's labors, and many of them worth ten times as much as I am.

Yesterday I alluded to another thing, to which I wish for a moment to revert. The pay of naval officers is: for an Admiral $13,000 a year; Vice-Admiral, $9,000; rear-admiral, $6,000; commodores, $5,000; captains, $4,500; commanders, $3,500; lieutenants, first four years from date of commission, $2,800, and four years from date of commission, $3,000, with a provision for longevity pay at 10 per cent. for each five years of service, not to exceed in all 40 per cent.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Texas will remember that with the two highest officers of the Navy, the Admiral and Vice-Admiral, that rank expires with the lives of the present incumbents.

Mr. REAGAN. Fortunately for the country.

Now, I would like the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to tell us the number of supernumerary officers in the Navy—those on duty and those on leave—who are now receiving pay? This debate has come up, Mr. Speaker, in a way that we have not been able to do this.

I will proceed with my statement, and I wish here to call attention to the further fact that these men when retired get three-fourths of the pay of an officer of the same rank on duty.

Look at the Army list. The General of the Army gets $13,500 a year; at present there is no General of the Army. The Lieutenant-General gets $11,000, a major-general $7,500 a year, a brigadier-general $5,500, a colonel $3,500, a lieutenant-colonel $3,000, and so on, together with longevity pay of 10 per cent. for each five years of service, not to exceed 40 per cent. This applies to those below brigadier-generals. It is also true they are furnished with rations, and when mounted with forage, so if they wish they can save the greater portion of their pay, except in the case of those who have families which have to be supported out of the pay of the officer.

Mr. SAYERS. Will my colleague yield to me for one question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. Will my colleague tell us what we shall do with the graduates at the Naval Academy at Annapolis and what we shall do with the Naval Academy itself?

Mr. REAGAN. I will tell you what I would do if I had the power. I would at once provide by law that only one-half of the present number of cadets in the Naval Academy at Annapolis and one-half of the cadets at West Point should be educated there at the Government's expense. The last time I examined into the subject we had over four hundred supernumerary officers in the Army. Now we have three hundred and twenty-five cadets for appointment in the Naval Academy. Then we had two hundred and ninety-three.

Mr. McADOO. Let me ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. REAGAN. My time is limited, and I fear I shall be cut off before concluding what I wish to say.

Mr. McADOO. No; I do not wish to cut the gentleman off; but I would like to ask him whether he is aware how many graduates at the Naval Academy at Annapolis are appointed into the Navy?

Mr. REAGAN. I am not aware.

Mr. McADOO. Only ten.

Mr. REAGAN. Only ten?

Mr. McADOO. Only ten who go into the Navy. There are quite a number graduated, of course, who do not go into the Navy.

Mr. REAGAN. That may be very true. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a point here, and I am very sorry to have to refer to the remarks made by my colleague from Texas as well as by the gentleman from New Jersey, who speak of the men who served throughout the war, and yet who can not be retired as superannuated, as "dead wood," and who must be displaced to let in these young cadets to come into command. They would retire the brave veteran naval officers for the purpose of putting these cadets in commission and in command of the ships of war. I do not understand the propriety or the justice of such a course. I, of course, sympathize with the cadets and wish them well, but we can not afford to tax the people to place upon the retired-list a large number of able-bodied officers to draw their pay and do nothing in order to furnish these cadets with commissions. The education that is given to these young men is better, as a rule, than our sons at home get. If they can not, therefore, get commissions in the Navy or the Army I do not know any reason why, nor is there any impropriety in, their going home and earning a livelihood in private life with the splendid education which has been afforded to them at the cost of the Government. But no; that will not do. It is necessary to sustain and enlarge the American aristocracy by multiplying officers and giving them pay for doing nothing. I think, sir, from what the gentleman from New Jersey has said, and from what my colleague has said, and from what the gentleman from Illinois has said, that it will be understood we simply propose to retire officers in the full vigor of their manhood, men of approved patriotism and courage in battle, in order that we may get increased rank for an increased number of officers and get commissions for cadets who hope to be officers.

Mr. McADOO. The gentleman from Texas certainly did not understand me as advocating any such policy as that.

Mr. THOMAS. And let me say to the gentleman from Texas that it is a purely voluntary thing as far as this question of retirement is concerned. These officers are not forced to go on the retired-list unless they desire to do so.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have always felt more pride in the naval service of this country, in its integrity and the purity of the gentlemen composing it and in the patriotism of its officers, than in any other branch of the public service. I know that there are many gallant naval officers who would indignantly decline to accept this bounty which gentlemen seem anxious to force upon the service, preferring to perform the duties which they are still capable of performing. But there is a large class, those who lead the german in Washington, those who hang around the hotel lobbies, who are anxious for additional rank and pay in any way, who, sir, are willing to accept this pay and retire from the service in order that they may have a little better position and more opportunity to lead the german. [Laughter.]

Mr. McADOO. If the gentleman will consent to the retirement of those officers who are affected by this bill, the effect of that will be to take away from the lobbies of the hotels the very class of persons to which he now alludes. It will take them away and send them to sea or give them a chance to perform duty in some capacity.

Mr. REAGAN. I would take an easier plan than that. I would let them know that they had better go home now and go to work like honest men and not lie around here trying to obtain a living without labor at the expense of the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. McADOO. If you would, then do it by law.

Mr. REAGAN. Those who fill up the ranks of the lobby, those who hang around the doors of Congress, who are continually asking for legislation, who pray Congress for special legislation always in favor of the privileged classes, always discriminating against the laboring people who have to pay the taxes, are the men who should be driven off into service. [Applause.]

But, sir, I only expected to allude to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois as to the assertion that the remarks I have made were communistic in their tendency. I may be permitted to say that I thank Almighty God I have in me something of the spirit of Jefferson and the fathers of this Republic, and that my people have given me permission to stand here upon the floor of this House and plead for purity, integrity, and virtue in the management of our affairs. But the ring of officers around the lobbies, the ring of claim agents, and the thousand and one hangers-on around Congress are still to be heard in the consideration of these measures, while the people at home who earn their living by their own labor, who pay the taxes, but who are never represented here, are to be called upon to put their hands into their pockets still deeper in order to meet the frauds imposed upon them by those who ought to protect them.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. In my remarks to which the gentleman from Texas has taken exception I wish to repeat that I did not mean to assert that he was a communist, but simply to say that the tendency of the doctrine advocated by him was communistic. That was what I meant, and what I said, and nothing more; and, as I said before, I meant no personal reflection whatever upon him.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that if I am a communist every member of the earlier Congresses was communistic in his sentiments upon this same subject.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I will leave the country to determine whether the gentleman from Texas is nearer to the Constitution in the doctrines he advocates or the Naval Committee of the House, who are trying to look after the interests of the country in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution.

I now move, for the purpose of having this bill perfected, and to meet some of the objections which have been urged here, that it be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it in order at this time to move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, under the rules, the motion to refer, or to recommit, which is the same thing, and the motion to amend, which is the motion suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, stand upon an exact footing of equality, and that the one first made must be first put.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But it is in order——

The SPEAKER. It will be in order if the other motion, the motion to recommit, is voted down

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it in order at this time to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I make the motion.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I ask whether the gentleman from Ohio can take me off the floor for the purpose of making a motion to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. He can not take the gentleman off the floor, but the gentleman from Illinois, having made his motion, is not on the floor. His hour has expired.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I inquire further whether it is proper under the rules at this time to move to lay the bill on the table, or whether the proper motion is not to lay my motion on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read, from which the gentleman will see that the motion to lay the bill on the table has precedence over the motion to refer.

The Clerk read clause 4 of Rule XVI, as follows:

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, to take a recess, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motion shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer or amend, or to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will see the motion to lay on the table is the one which has precedence. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to lay the pending bill on the table. That motion is not debatable.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 73, noes 91.

Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. STORM called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 49 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 156, not voting 62; as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I move to dispense with the reading of the names of members voting.

There was no objection.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. KELLEY, until further notice.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. HISCOCK, until January 29.

Mr. GIBSON, of Maryland, with Mr. PAYNE, until January 29.

Mr. T. J. CAMPBELL with Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, until January 27.

Mr. SENEY with Mr. JOHNSON, of New York, until further notice.

Mr. WISE with Mr. LIBBEY, until further notice.

Mr. BRAGG with Mr. GUENTHER, until January 30.

Mr. CARLETON with Mr. STEPHENSON, until January 30.

Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, until February 1.

Mr. DIBBLE with Mr. WEST, for two days.

Mr. BARKSDALE with Mr. GOFF, on this vote.

Mr. BLAND with Mr. ROCKWELL, for this day.

Mr. HENDERSON, of ILLINOIS, with Mr. CLARDY, for this day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The hour expired during the call of the roll.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. The matter is not now before the House. It will go over as unfinished business, with the motion to recommit pending.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay the bill on the table was rejected; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that the hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The motion can be entertained, but the vote can not be taken now, the hour having expired. The time expired during the roll-call; but the practice in such cases has been always to complete the call of the roll.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether it is in order to move to call up the bill (H. R. 392) on the House Calendar for the forfeiture of railroad land grants.

The SPEAKER. It is in order to move to proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar.

Mr. COBB. What I want to ascertain, Mr. Speaker, is whether the Committee on Public Lands has the power at any time to call up bills in connection with railroad land grants.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, under the rules as amended at the present session, when the Committee on Public Lands makes a report of the character specified in the rule at a time when the House is not actually engaged in the consideration of some other matter, it may proceed at once to the consideration of that report, just as in the case of the Committee on Printing, or the Committee on Accounts, or other privileged committees; but that if the Committee on Public Lands report a bill in the usual way upon the call of committees, and the bill goes upon the Calendar, it then takes its place on the Calendar just like any other bill. That has always been the practice with reference to reports of a like character. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] can move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar.

Mr. COBB. I make that motion, Mr. Speaker.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, would it now be in order to move to pass over any bills which may precede this upon the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that a motion to postpone must be made upon each bill as it is reached, or the gentleman can raise the question of consideration.

The first business upon the House Calendar was a bill (H. R. 3) to prevent the claim of the war taxes under the act of August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereof, by the United States, as set-off against States having claims against the General Government.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, there will be no occasion to raise any question upon that bill. When the report was made it was agreed that this week should be allowed to the minority to prepare their views to be presented to the House, and therefore I ask that the bill be passed over.

The SPEAKER. That may be done by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The next business upon the House Calendar was a bill (H. R. 392) declaring forfeited certain grants of lands made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads.

Mr. COBB. That is the bill which I desire to have considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the several acts and parts of acts of Congress as are below recited be, and they are hereby, repealed, namely:

Chapter 83, eleventh Statutes at Large, page 30, approved August 11, 1856, entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Mississippi to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, and for other purposes," except so much of said act as relates to a grant of land in aid of "a railroad from Jackson to the line between the State of Mississippi and the State of Alabama," which road was completed within the time prescribed by said act.

Also, so much of chapter 41, eleventh Statutes at Large, page 17, approved June 3, 1856, entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Alabama, &c.," as relates to a grant of lands in aid of the construction of railroads from Elyton to the Tennessee River at or near Beard's Bluff, Alabama.

Also, to aid in the construction of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, in section 6 of said act.

Also, section 7 of the act of March 3, 1857, chapter 99, 11 Statutes at Large, page 197, making a grant to the State of Alabama in aid of the Savannah and Albany Railroad Company, as recited in said section.

Also, so much of chapter 42, 11 Statutes at Large, page 18, entitled "An act making a grant of lands to the State of Louisiana to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," as relates to a railroad from New Orleans to the State line in the direction of Jackson, Miss.

That all rights, titles, and privileges as to any of the public lands granted or conferred by, through, or under the said several provisions of law be, and they are hereby, declared forfeited and determined; that all the lands within the terms and scope of said several provisions of law be, and they are hereby, restored to the public domain, and subject to sale, disposition, and settlement under existing law as though said acts and parts of acts had never been enacted.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I presume it will be unnecessary for me to go into any detailed statement of the facts and the law in this case, but I may remind the House that this bill was passed in the last Congress by an almost unanimous vote. Then, however, it contained a provision which was objectionable to several members of the House—the provision for the forfeiture of the grant to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad. The committee determined that it would be better to strike that provision out of this bill and thereby enable the House to pass it without opposition. The grants embraced in this bill are held by the committee, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be grants in præsenti; in other words, it is held that the title to the lands vested in the corporations, the States to which the grants were made, for the benefit of the railroad companies, at the dates of the grants, and therefore it becomes necessary, in order to restore these lands to the public domain, to repeal those laws, or to declare the forfeiture of the lands to the Government. As a matter of fact, however, I may state that the committee has information which is not disputed that none of the roads mentioned in this bill have undertaken to complete their lines to any extent whatever. The lands remain in the corporations to which they have been granted; they are withheld from settlement, and, as I have stated, will forever be so under the decision of the Supreme Court, unless Congress takes some action to restore them to the public domain.

I have letters from parties living in the neighborhood of some of these grants who say that this is a very great obstruction to the settlement of the lands, and I have no doubt that such is the case. For this reason the committee will insist that these grants ought to be forfeited. There is no reason why they should not be; but, on the contrary, there is every reason in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take up the time of the House. If any gentleman desires to ask a question for information I shall be glad to answer it; otherwise I shall not occupy any further time. If there is no desire to discuss the bill, the question will be first upon the amendment proposed by the committee, which is to strike out that portion of the bill which would forfeit the grant made to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word on the motion which will first come before the House—that is, the amendment proposed by the committee to strike from the bill so much as relates to the forfeiture of the grant to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad, of Mississippi. As the bill was introduced in the House and acted upon by the committee, it contemplated the forfeiture of that grant in connection with the other grants. For some reason, I do not know what, the committee recommend an amendment excepting from the operation of this bill the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad grant. In January, 1884, when this same question was before the House, the Gulf and Ship Island matter was very thoroughly discussed, and by a very large majority a bill was passed including the forfeiture of that with all these other grants. Since that action of the last House I have seen nothing to change my opinion as to the propriety and necessity of forfeiting this particular grant. On the other hand, there have occurred since that action some things—which I think were not known to the majority of the gentlemen upon the Public Lands Committee—which impress me with the belief that this amendment should not be adopted, and that the grant to the Gulf and Ship Island road should to-day be forfeited. Let me state the facts which have occurred since the action of the last Congress on this subject.

During the summer of 1884 and subsequent to the action of the House forfeiting that grant, an application was made by the proper officer of the present Gulf and Ship Island Company to the Secretary of the Interior asking him to withdraw from settlement or sale the lands which would be embraced in that grant if the grant were good. In July, 1884, the Secretary of the Interior ordered this withdrawal; and these lands are now not open either to settlement or to sale. That raises the question whether the original grant was of such character as to justify the withdrawal in 1884 of the lands covered by it. It is to this question I wish to address myself for a moment.

If I remember correctly, in 1856 a grant was made to the State of Mississippi of certain lands, embracing with some others a six-mile strip for the benefit of the Gulf and Ship Island road. The condition of that grant, upon its face, was that it should terminate at the end of ten years unless the road should by that time be completed and all the conditions of the grant fulfilled. In 1866 the road had not been completed. There had not been, I think, a shovelful of dirt thrown upon it. There were no ties, no rails—in fact there was nothing except simply a corporation known as the Gulf and Ship Island Company and perhaps some preliminary surveys. But it was not pretended then, nor is it pretended now, that any road was ever built by that company under that grant; and the grant itself expired at the end of ten years—in 1866.

Of course the answer made on this point is that during the war period the State of Mississippi, or rather this company, could not build the road. I admit all that; but I hold that the United States Government was not responsible for this lack of action. I hold that grant to have been made like any other grant, offering to those who might choose to become incorporated as a company the right to take up and fulfill the terms of the grant. It makes no difference to the Government or to Congress what may have been the reason why men have not complied with the conditions; the fact is, they did not comply.

The company which was then incorporated died. In 1882, a very great many years after the original grant by its terms had expired, and after the original company had died, the Legislature of Mississippi incorporated a railroad company known as the Gulf and Ship Island Company to construct a road between the termini provided in the original grant; and this, it is now alleged, is a corporation which has some claims under the original grant. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the company incorporated in 1882, although it bears the same name, is not the company incorporated by the State of Mississippi in 1856, or 1855, or 1854; and the best evidence of that fact—at least to my mind—is this: If there were now alive a Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company incorporated back, say, in 1854, then the Legislature of Mississippi would not in 1882 incorporate another company bearing the same name and confer upon it precisely the same privileges. In other words, I can not see that this was an act of reincorporation. It was an act of new and original incorporation; and the present Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company is no more the company which might have claimed under that grant before the expiration of the period fixed, 1866, than a certain John Smith born in 1882 is the John Smith born in the same State in 1800. This is a wholly different company. The act of the Legislature is a new act of incorporation—the creation of a new company.

Now, this new company, I suppose, under the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court in the case of Schulenburg vs. Harriman—and incidentally I wish to say that to my mind the decision in that case is one of the most infamous railroad decisions that ever came from any judicial body—this company, incorporated in 1882, under the doctrine of that decision, as I suppose, makes the claim that it has rights under the grant of 1856. For my part, I can not see how it can have any rights in any respect. That grant expired in 1866. The company to which the State of Mississippi gave it died. In 1882 this new company is incorporated and comes up and makes claim to the land which would have been covered by the original grant if that grant were yet alive. The whole thing is absurd on its face.

But it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the present Gulf and Ship Island Company must be one having considerable power in the State of Mississippi. I notice that the Legislature in incorporating it, in giving to it whatever privileges it might, provided that its property should be exempted from taxation for twenty years. By another act of the Legislature of Mississippi—passed, I think, in 1882—this same company is given the privilege of purchasing at the rate of 2 cents an acre certain swamp lands—lands, I suppose, which were originally given to that State by the United States.

Mr. VAN EATON. I would like to ask the gentleman to what company he now refers.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The Gulf and Ship Island Company.

Mr. VAN EATON. They had the privilege of doing what?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Of doing that which I have just stated. I may be incorrect in my statement, for it is some time since I looked at the matter; but I wish a page would go to the Library and bring me the statutes of the State of Mississippi for 1882.

Mr. VAN EATON. I wish a page would do that; for I would like to have the gentleman read the law to which he has referred.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I may be mistaken; but my impression is that the facts are as I have stated. I will examine the law. I think that the Legislature granted to this same company—if I am not correct I hope my friend from Mississippi will correct me, because, living in that State, he necessarily knows more about these matters than I can, and what I am stating is simply based on my reading of the acts of that Legislature—I certainly desire to make no incorrect statements; but I think the Legislature constituted this same company the lessees of the penitentiary. Is that correct? I think there is an act of the Legislature of Mississippi in 1882 or 1884 giving to this Gulf and Ship Island Company the right to take the convicts of the penitentiary and use them in building this identical road.

If I am in error I hope to be corrected. I only suggest these things, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of saying that it seems to me that there is great vitality and power in the present Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company. In other words, that this exact vitality is in and of itself a sufficient reason why Congress, when that company is making a claim to these lands under a grant of 1856, and when the Secretary of the Interior in 1884 withdrew from market lands attaching to a grant which had been dead nearly twenty years—that these things, taken together, are reasons why this House should forfeit that grant. That is my point.

I hold here a statement from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which I will ask to have read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. What is the substance of the paper which the gentleman asks to have read?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would prefer to have it read. I can not see any reason why, when we are passing a bill which will properly forfeit some eight different grants which have expired, we should except from its operation one of the grants, and the only one which is claimed with vigor. Nor to my mind is there any force in the proposition that it will be better to withdraw this particular case from the operation of the general bill lest it might meet opposition in some other body.

Mr. CANNON. Has this road ever been constructed?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. There never was a shovelfull of dirt thrown upon it; never in the world.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the reason of the exception in this particular case?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I do not know; I was not present during that portion of the session of the committee, being a few minutes late; and I am certain that if the committee had been in possession of the knowledge of the fact that these lands, since the last House forfeited this identical grant, had been withdrawn from settlement, the majority of the committee would have acted otherwise.

Now I would like to have this paper read as a portion of my remarks.

Mr. VAN EATON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question right there. I understand the gentleman to assert that nothing has been done toward the building of the road, that not a shovelfull of dirt has been thrown upon it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Of the old road, not one. If I am in error I will be happy to correct it. There may have been some of the new road worked upon since 1882. My understanding is there never was a shovelful of dirt before 1882. Am I correct?

Mr. VAN EATON. Let me ask how long it has been since the gentleman was down there on that Gulf and Ship Island Railroad?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I never have been there, but I can read the acts of your Legislature. I ask for the reading of the paper sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CANNON. The object of my question was for information. Is the road now constructed?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. My friend from Mississippi can answer that question better than I can.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Mississippi say whether the road is constructed or not?

Mr. VAN EATON. It is not.

Mr. CANNON. I mean the road spoken of.

Mr. VAN EATON. Does the gentleman mean whether it is finished, completed.

Mr. CANNON. Or any part of it.

Mr. VAN EATON. It is being worked on.

Mr. CANNON. How much is in operation?

Mr. VAN EATON. None of it that I know of.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is satisfactory. Now read the paper.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 16th instant inquiring as to the status of the grant for the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company in the State of Mississippi, and whether a withdrawal of public lands was ever made for the benefit of said grant, and asking for "any information relative to this grant," I have the honor to advise you as follows:

The grant to aid in the construction of a road from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico was made by act of Congress approved August 11, 1856, to the State of Mississippi (11 Statutes, page 31), and said grant was accepted by act of the State Legislature approved February 2, 1857, and conferred on the company named by act approved December 3, 1858.

On August 9, 1856, after the passage of the bill by Congress, but before the approval of the act, the district land officers were directed by telegraph to withdraw from sale and location the land falling within the probable limits of the grant, and by letter of August 15, 1856, said officers were advised of the object of said withdrawal and instructed to continue the same until further orders.

On November 27, 1860, this office received a map of definite location of the line of said company's road, which had been filed in the local office at Jackson, Miss., and transmitted with register's letter of November 23, 1860. By office letter of December 3, 1860, the president of said company was advised that said map had been accepted as the basis of adjustment, and that the lands inuring for the road would be certified to the State at the earliest practicable moment. All action in the matter was, however, suspended by the breaking out of the late war in the spring of 1861, and no withdrawal ordered on the filing of said map.

After the local offices in Mississippi were reopened, in 1866, the receiver at Jackson, by letter dated February 1, 1867, asked to be advised whether or not the lands along the route of the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad were subject to homestead entry, and he was informed in reply by letter of March 18, 1867, that such lands as had been set apart as embraced in grants for railroad purposes were not subject to such entry. Said letter did not specifically state that lands along the line of the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad were not subject to entry, and no attention appears to have been paid either by the local officers or this office to the withdrawal of 1856 therefor, entries for lands within the limits of the grant being admitted and patented.

By act of July 4, 1876 (19 Stat., 73), lands in Mississippi were directed to be offered at public sale as other public lands, and, under this act, lands in said State, including those within the limits of the grant in question, were offered in 1878 and 1879, and such as were not then disposed of were subsequently held as being subject to homestead, pre-emption, and private entry; and no objection was raised by either the State or company to such entries or sales until July 17, 1882.

On the latter date the then Secretary of the Interior referred to this office a letter without date from Mr. Wirt Adams, president of said company, requesting the withdrawal from sale and entry of the lands in question, and after a report had been made to the Department in the matter (9 Copp, 175), said request was denied by the Secretary, mainly on the ground that the State had not asserted any claim to the lands for twenty years, and because there was nothing on file in the Department to show what disposition, if any, the Legislature of the State had made of the grant.

The present Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company was organized under an act of the Legislature of Mississippi, approved February 23, 1882, and by act of March 13, 1884, said State conferred on the present company the rights and privileges theretofore granted to the original company, the new company being required, as far as practicable, to construct its road upon the line of the original survey.

By letter dated March 28, 1884, Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Mississippi requested the withdrawal from sale of the lands granted to said State to aid in the construction of the railroad named. Said letter was referred to this office by the Department for report, and on May 15, 1884, a report was submitted, setting forth substantially the facts hereinbefore recited, and suggesting, if it should be decided to order a withdrawal, that the company, as grantee of the State, be called upon to file a formal relinquishment in favor of all parties who may have been permitted to make entry up to the date of the communication of such order to the district land officers.

By letter of June 19, 1884, the Secretary of the Interior advised the Senators and Representatives above referred to that the lands would be suspended from sale pending final action by Congress in the matter of the forfeiture of the grant upon the condition suggested in office report of May 15, 1884.

On June 30, 1884, a written relinquishment, executed June 24, 1884, by the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company, was filed in the Department, by which said company "waive and release any and all claims on behalf of the State and in its own behalf to all the lands entered, or sold by the United States, make this formal relinquishment in favor of all parties who may have been permitted to enter or pre-empt the same up to the time when the order of withdrawal shall be received at the local office in Jackson, Miss.," reserving the right of indemnity for such land.

The relinquishment was deemed insufficient by the Secretary of the Interior, who, in his letter transmitting the same to this office, June 30, 1884, stated that "the suspension from sale should not be ordered until the company has executed and filed at the local office a supplemental instrument of waiver, relinquishing all lands in favor of actual bona fide settlers who made improvements thereon prior to the time when notice of suspension shall be received at the local office."

A supplemental waiver was accordingly called for in accordance with the above requirement, which was executed July 1, 1884, and filed in the Department, and a copy of the same was transmitted to this office by the Secretary with letter of July 5, 1884, which directed the suspension of the lands from further sale and entry to be made, in accordance with which such suspension was ordered by office letter "F," July 8, 1884, which was received at the local office July 11, ensuing.

Said order of suspension directed the local officers, upon its receipt, to "suspend from settlement and entry the vacant lands in the even-numbered sections falling within the fifteen-mile limits" of the grant referred to, and this suspension remains unrevoked.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. J. SPARKS, Commissioner.

JOHN A. ANDERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish simply to add, Mr. Chairman, to what I have already said, that it was in 1884 instead of 1882 that the Legislature of Mississippi passed the act enabling the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company to become lessees of the convict labor of the penitentiary. The act permitting it to buy swamp-lands at 2 cents an acre was approved March 15, 1884. (See Laws of Mississippi, 1884, page 966.)

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, there was so much confusion in the Chamber at the time the statement was made by my colleague, the Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, in reference to this bill that it was but slightly understood on this side of the House. I do not intend to consume any time in connection with an argument on the bill. I assume that when the facts are understood in reference to the bill there will not be a dissenting vote to it.

By the act of Congress of August, 1856, grants of land were made to four different railroads in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama; one of them being the Jackson and State Line Railway, another the Tuscaloosa and Mobile road, another the Mobile and New Orleans road, and another providing for a railway from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico.

These grants were made, as I have said, in 1856, and contained a provision that the grants of land were made upon the express condition that the roads named should be constructed and completed within ten years from that time. The ten years elapsed, and no steps whatever were ever taken with reference to the construction of any one of them.

As to the road from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico, a corporation was organized and a map of location was filed in the Interior Department, and then all proceedings terminated as to that road. The same year, on the 3d of June, a similar grant was made by Congress to two other roads, the Elyton and Beard's Bluff Railroad, and the Memphis and Charleston road, and with like conditions. As to these two roads nothing was done in reference to these grants, nothing whatever.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. The records of the Land Office do not show that the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company accepted the grant. They built their road and completed it without any land grant whatever.

Mr. PAYSON. I am coming to that later in the course of my remarks. By the act of March 3, 1859, similar grants of land were made to the Savannah and Albany road and to the New Orleans and State Line Railroad, and upon the same conditions with reference to the completion of the roads.

Perhaps it might be as well to say here, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, that as to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad there never was an acceptance of that grant by the State of Alabama. All of these grants were made in the first instance to the different States named, to be by them conferred upon the railroads under certain conditions named in the act, the roads receiving them in the second instance.

Now, here are eight lines of railroad in all of which cases land grants were made at this remote period, and nothing whatever was done, nothing whatever, in reference to them until long after the expiration of the time within which the roads named were to have been completed. It was regarded, I ought to say further, by the officers of the Interior Department that after the lapse of all this time the lands reverted by operation of law to the public domain. But the Supreme Court, in the case of Shulenburg vs. Harriman, reported in 211 Wallace, decided that these grants, and others of like character, vested a present title in the grantee (in this case in each of the different States named), and that the title remained in abeyance, no matter whether there had been compliance with the conditions of the grant or not, until Congress should affirmatively take some action looking to the revocation of the grant and the restoration of the lands to the public domain. That rendered necessary, Mr. Speaker, some action on the part of Congress, and to that end in the Forty-seventh Congress a bill identical in terms with this was introduced and favorably reported from the Judiciary Committee of the House. By reason of the press of business on the Calendar no action was taken with reference to that bill. It was also introduced in the last Congress—a similar bill—referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and by that committee was favorably reported to this House, and by an overwhelming vote—I think, if my memory serves me right, the vote against it only aggregated some 8 or 10—it passed this House and went to the other end of the Capitol and there died. In this Congress the same bill has been introduced, couched in similar language, and the report, I think, comes unanimously from the Committee on Public Lands.

Now the reason for omitting the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad from the operation of this bill is this: Since the last Congress the Legislature of Mississippi have assumed the right to confer the grant of land which was made in aid of the road from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico upon a corporation known as the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad, and it is asserted that that company has not only made its survey of the line, but that the road is in the course of construction. A bill has been introduced and is now pending—introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE]—asking that an extension of time be granted as to this road, within which it may comply with the conditions so as to secure the benefit of this grant. The point was made in the committee that if that road could be excepted from the operation of this bill no possible objection could be urged, nor would there be a vote against the passage of this bill, which, omitting the Gulf and Ship Island grant, would restore to the public domain from five to eight million acres of the public lands; and in order to expedite the passage of the bill forfeiting grants as to which there is no objection to forfeiture we in the committee agreed to except from the operation of this bill the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad.

I may say in passing I am in favor of, and always expect to be in favor of, a forfeiture of that grant; and when the bill shall come up from the Public Lands Committee, whether reported favorably or not, I expect to be heard on that question. But the reason for the exception I have stated, in answer to the suggestions of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], so that it may be understood by this side of the Chamber and by the other if my voice is audible across the Hall, is that there may be no delay with reference to the passage of this bill as to the seven railroad grants as to which there is no possible objection to forfeiture.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to ask the gentleman what, if any, inducement was held out to the Gulf and Ship Island Corporation newly incorporated to begin the construction of this work?

Mr. PAYSON. The Supreme Court having decided the title to the land remains in the State until Congress shall take affirmative action restoring it to the public domain, the delegation of Mississippi believed in the last Congress that if the construction of the road was begun and was being prosecuted in apparently good faith, Congress would not forfeit the grant and the State of Mississippi could bestow it upon the corporation engaged in the work.

Mr. PETERS. Did not, then, the prospect of obtaining the benefit of this grant enter largely into the motives that induced the new corporation to begin the construction of the work?

Mr. PAYSON. It was the sole inducement, as I am led to believe. But all that will come up and be subject to debate when the committee shall report on the Gulf and Ship Island bill now pending before it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to state that the bill which is pending of which he speaks is not to forfeit that grant? Am I correct?

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman is not correct. There is a bill pending before the Public Lands Committee to forfeit the Gulf and Ship Island grant. But in addition to that there is another bill presented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] asking the committee to recommend to the House that the time within which the road may be constructed may be extended in the future.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman for the information. I had not understood him correctly.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to make an inquiry of my colleague, whether the propriety of extending the time depends upon a question of good faith in regard to the relations heretofore existing between the Government and that road or on a question of public policy, whether it would be in the interest of the public to confirm the grant or extend the time, just as if it was a question as to making the grant de novo?

Mr. PAYSON. While the question has not been debated in the committee, I know as a member of the committee, from what gentlemen have said who favor giving the grant, that the claim is based on the assumption that it is an act of public policy to give it precisely the same as if the case were presented de novo as to that road. That is, I believe, all I care to say in reference to this bill.

Mr. LAIRD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAIRD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the rights of any settlers or purchasers attach to any land covered by that grant.

Mr. PAYSON. None whatever, and for the reason that so far as the lands to which the bill relates are concerned there has never been any attempt on the part of anybody to exercise the right of sale to any of these lands, because no corporations have ever claimed them.

Mr. OATES. Is it not a fact that the local land officers, regarding the title of the railroads as having ceased, have permitted nearly all these lands covered by these grants to be taken up for homestead or pre-emption settlement and that the passage of this bill is considered necessary to perfect the title of these settlers?

Mr. PAYSON. Not to the degree indicated by the gentleman from Alabama. In some cases homestead and pre-emption settlements of these lands have been allowed by the Interior Department, the officers of the Department acting on the presumption, as I said a few moments ago, that because the railroads were not constructed within the time specified the land reverted to the public domain and was subject to sale and settlement, but that I believe has not been carried out with reference to any large proportion of these lands.

Mr. OATES. I will state to the gentleman that nearly all of the lands in my own State have been sold and settled.

Mr. PAYSON. What the gentleman may know as a question of fact I do not dispute. But the knowledge we have about it coming in official documents from the Secretary of the Interior to the Committee on Public Lands indicates that but a small portion of the lands has been restored to the public domain.

Mr. OATES. I think the gentleman from Illinois misunderstands me. I did not mean that these lands were sold by the grantees, but that they were sold by the Government.

Mr. PAYSON. I understand that. But on the promulgation of the decision in Shulenburg vs. Harriman the land offices at once suspended action as to all these lands.

Mr. VAN EATON. I had no idea, Mr. Speaker, that any discussion would have been had to-day as to the merits of the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad, nor did I intend to speak to-day as to the merits of the grant to that road. I only ask the attention of the House for a few moments while I place before it plainly the attitude of the question that is now up for discussion. There was introduced on the first call of States for the introduction of bills a bill forfeiting some six or eight land grants in the Southern States. That bill included the forfeiture of the land grant spoken of by my colleague on the committee [Mr. PAYSON] to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad.

Now, I am stating no committee secret when I say that when that bill came up for consideration it was suggested by, I think, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] in the first instance, that we should drop out the grant to the Gulf and Ship Island road, and recommend the passage of the bill so amended. After some discussion that was unanimously agreed to. The committee unanimously agreed to the report that is now upon the Clerk's desk. They agreed to amend the bill by dropping out the forfeiture of the grant to the Gulf and Ship Island road; and the sole question now before the House is as to adopting the amendment thus unanimously recommended by the Committee on the Public Lands. Afterward the question will be on the passage of the bill so amended.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me to make a personal statement?

Mr. VAN EATON. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish simply to repeat what I said before, that when this bill was taken up in the committee I was not present. I was absent from that portion of the session, though I was present at a subsequent period in that session. I have no doubt that the statement of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] is entirely correct; but I wish to say that if I had been present the vote would not have been unanimous.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] has stated is correct; but it does not detract from what I have said, that the recommendation passed the committee unanimously. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary to have the assent of all the absent members of a committee in order to make a recommendation unanimous. The gentleman certainly was not there. Now, sir, I wish the attention of the House for just a few minutes. I do not intend to address myself now to the merits of the bill. The committee thought in reference to the seven or eight other proposed forfeitures that there was no possible objection to them, and would be none from anybody. The grants were for roads that were dead, that had never been completed or never been begun at all, or like the case mentioned by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] where the railroad company refused to accept the grant on the proposed terms and built the road without it. In other words, all the others were forfeitures, about which there was no sort of controversy; but about this particular road in my State there was controversy. The old members of the House will remember that in the Forty-eighth Congress I addressed them briefly on this matter, and I say now, as I said then, that the Legislature of the State have persistently memorialized Congress to revive this grant. Since that time the company has gone to work, re-surveys and relocations have been made, the work has been commenced, and there is hope that the road will be built.

But this question will come up in due time. There is a bill pending before the committee looking to an extension of the time, or, if you choose, to a revival of this grant. When that bill comes up it is the intention of the committee to present it fairly before the House, and then there will be opportunity for free, full, fair, open discussion of the merits of the bill. The committee thought it better to pursue the course it has pursued here in order that there might be no discussion at this time in the House—it was not supposed there would be any—and in order that there might be no discussion at the other end of the Capitol, as there was on the bill of forfeitures in the Forty-eighth Congress. In other words, we thought in the committee that here were seven or eight millions of acres of the public lands the title to which was tied up, and it was right and proper for Congress to take action, and to take it as speedily as possible, in order that this state of things might be rectified and these lands be restored to the public domain. By pursuing the course which we recommended we felt that that sort of a bill, or this bill amended as we proposed, would pass this House and the other branch of Congress without objection and become a law, and that thus the lands would be restored. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all. The amendment hath this extent, no more. This is not the time to discuss the merits of the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad grant, but when the proper time comes, I trust we shall have a full, free, fair, calm discussion and consideration of that question.

The idea of the committee, I may be permitted to say, was that it would be best that this proposition be considered alone and solely upon its own merits, and that the bill forfeiting these grants to these other roads, as to which there is no doubt of the propriety of forfeiture, should be now passed through both Houses and become a law.

Mr. Speaker, that is the explanation. I simply ask this House to sustain the recommendation of the committee, which is that in the present bill we drop out, for the time being only, all that relates to the forfeiture of the lands granted to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad. The committee will ere long report the pending bill on this subject and lay the whole matter fully before the House. But we do ask that this bill may not be trammeled in any way; that the recommendation of the committee may be accepted and the amendment adopted for the reasons I have mentioned. That is all there is about it. Having stated so much, I do not care to weary the attention of the House further.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him a question. Suppose this amendment be now adopted and thereafter what he calls "the pending bill" comes before the House?

Mr. VAN EATON. The bill pending before the committee.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Suppose that to be a bill turning upon the question whether the time for the completion of that road shall be extended or not. Now with reference to that bill I desire to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] whether it will be claimed that there is any reason for making that extension on account of any equitable or other claim based upon anything that the Government has heretofore done, or whether the claim for such extension will turn solely upon the question of public policy in the same manner as if this were an original question and no such corporation had ever existed. In other words, will the question be whether it is in the interest of the people now to make a new land grant to a new corporation for the purpose of building that particular road?

Mr. COBB. That is the fact about it.

Mr. VAN EATON. There is and will be no complication with any other corporation or road. The case will be placed before this House solely upon its merits—nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. STRUBLE. But will it not be in effect, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] suggests, the making of a new grant under the condition of things which I understand to exist, according to the statement of the gentleman now on the floor?

Mr. VAN EATON. In reply to that, I will say I think not. As in the Forty-eighth Congress I endeavored to explain this matter, let me now briefly reply to the gentleman from Iowa. This land grant was originally made in 1856. For reasons for which the State and the people of the State were not to blame the road has not been built, though they were all the time desirous of building it. That grant continues in force by operation of law so far as the title of the company is concerned. Now, the people, believing they are in a condition at last to build the road with the aid of this grant, come and ask Congress to confirm to-day what was done in 1856. I may say further in reply to the gentleman, that if nothing had ever been done or said in connection with this grant—in other words, if it had never been made—the people of Mississippi would not come in now and ask for a new land grant; certainly not.

Mr. PETERS. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. VAN EATON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETERS. I understand there is now pending before the Committee a bill, known as "the Barksdale bill," to extend the time for the completion of the Gulf and Ship Island road. Now, if that "Barksdale bill" should be defeated, it would then be necessary to have a new bill for the purpose of forfeiting this land grant to the Gulf and Ship Island Company, would it not?

Mr. VAN EATON. That is true; or an amendment will be offered to that bill. There is no doubt the question will come up.

Mr. PETERS. Now the point I want to get at is this: Whatever may be the action of this House to-day in relation to this bill, will it in any way prejudice the action upon that bill to forfeit the land grant to the Gulf and Ship Island road when it does come up?

Mr. VAN EATON. It will not.

Mr. PETERS. Whatever action the House takes to-day can not be cited as a precedent either one way or the other—in favor of legislation or opposed to legislation?

Mr. VAN EATON. That is true; and I thank the gentleman from Kansas for making the suggestion. The action that the House may take to-day on this bill, as he says, will not in any way be a precedent, directly or indirectly, for any future action of this House. It leaves the question just where the Committee on Public Lands intended to leave it—as a matter standing upon its own footing, upon its own merits; nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman restate that proposition, so that it may be understood clearly by gentlemen in this part of the Hall?

Mr. VAN EATON. I take the responsibility of saying, as representing for the time being the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company interest, that no action had in this House to-day on the pending amendment will have any influence or be ever used as a precedent in any future debate when this matter comes up on its merits. We only ask a chance to let it come up on its merits; and when it does come up in that way the action of the House will be taken after fair, full, and free debate.

Mr. BAYNE. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that the course to be pursued by Congress with reference to this bill and this amendment is perfectly plain. I do not know anything about the merits of this particular proposition, nor do I understand the merits of the amendment which has been offered; but I understand this, that the grants made to these railroads either have been earned or they have not been earned. The grants made to the respective railroad corporations of the country have been earned or they have been unearned. This is self-evident. The statement made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] is to the effect that this grant has not been earned by this corporation. My position in reference to this grant and in reference to every other railroad grant in this country is that every grant which has not been earned should be forfeited to the Government of the United States. I think the immense domain which has been given to railroad corporations throughout this country, the immense tracts of land now in the hands of those corporations, and the difficulties which they have placed in the way of settlement of and emigration into those unoccupied fields is one of the absorbing and leading subjects for the consideration of this Congress. I think it is the plain and obvious duty of Congress, without speaking in derogation of this particular measure or any other, for I shall by my vote regard all alike—I think, sir, the plain duty of Congress is to work a forfeiture of every one of those land grants which have not been honestly and faithfully earned by the railroad corporation. Nobody need fear injustice to these corporations. The courts will protect every vested right; we can not harm one of them to a hair's breadth. The courts of the United States stand between Congress and these corporations, and will protect every right vested in them by good faith and in compliance with law.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. COBB. I wish to ask the gentleman one single question, because the opinion of the gentleman is worth something to this House. What does he mean by unearned land grants?

Mr. BAYNE. I mean the grants which have been earned are where the railroads in good faith and according to the conditions of their grant have prosecuted the construction of the line of railroad with a view to getting a title to the land in conformity to the statute.

Mr. COBB. Well, that is just exactly what I wanted to get at. Now suppose a railroad corporation—if the gentleman will pardon me—under its contract with the Government, is required to build its railroad line within a given time and fails to do it, would the gentleman regard that as an unearned land grant?

Mr. BAYNE. If a railroad corporation has had land granted to it by the Government and has prosecuted with reasonable diligence the construction of its line of road, and Congress has seen fit not to interfere with it up to this time, although the time for the completion of that road has expired, I think the grant under those circumstances has been earned, because the Government having the right to declare a forfeiture has failed to do so, but on the contrary has acquiesced in that failure.

Mr. COBB. Suppose you take a grant of this kind, where a grant has been made of 50,000,000 acres to a corporation to construct a road within a given time in order to secure an outlet for emigration to the Territories of the United States, and suppose at the end of the time required by Congress for the completion of the road 1,700 miles were uncompleted, what would you do there?

Mr. BAYNE. There is a case where the equities would come in.

Mr. COBB. Would the lands be earned under the contract?

Mr. BAYNE. I will not undertake to decide that question. There is a case where the interposition of the Congress of the United States might be exercised in equitable form. The lands along that portion of the road which had been completed might be treated as belonging to the railroad corporation, but the portion of the lands along the uncompleted portion of the road I say should be forfeited to the Government of the United States, and the Government of the United States should take possession of them.

Mr. COBB. Then the gentleman would——

Mr. BAYNE. I think in the case which the gentleman puts, that is to say where a part of the road has been constructed and another part has not been constructed, that so far as the portion of the road which has been constructed in good faith the land lying along the portion completed has been earned I would treat it as earned, but the portion of the road not constructed after a long lapse of time should be returned to the Government.

Mr. COBB. You are not controlled, then, by the contract of the law but by the rules of equity outside of the law.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not wish to get into an argument with my friend upon a question of law or upon a question of equity, because the Congress of the United States deals with policies, it deals with equities, it deals with what is right. It is not governed by any arbitrary or technical rule of law in this matter. It is governed by public policy, by the public welfare, by the public interest, by equity, by justice; and it is in that way I propose to treat this case.

Mr. HENLEY. There is one matter in connection with this debate, Mr. Speaker, to which I desire to invite the profound attention of the House, and it is this: In the Forty-eighth Congress a bill was reported to this House by the Committee on Public Lands which forfeited all the land grants embraced in the measure under discussion as well as the land grant included in the amendment of the committee. That bill, after protracted discussion, very earnest, very able, and, I have no doubt, very conscientious in antagonism on the part of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON], passed the House and went to the Senate. But it never received consideration in that body and was never brought up for discussion.

Now, here is what I desire that gentlemen of the House of Representatives should understand: That this bill was passed by the last House, and since that time two national conventions have assembled, each of which adopted resolutions in favor of the forfeiture of all forfeitable land grants. I intend to stand on that platform now. All "unearned land grants," some gentleman near me suggests, instead of "forfeitable." Well, I would just as soon accept that as being the proper designation of the term as the other. Now, if in the last Congress the gentleman from Mississippi had made the same kind of a fight that he does in this case he might have prevailed with that committee as he did with this—that is, if he had gone before that committee and had operated upon its fears, as it seems he did in this (according to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois), and induced that committee to believe that unless they excepted from the operation of the bill his grant of land he would defeat the entire bill; I say if he had gone before the committee and had done that then the matter would have been in the same condition that is presented now and here.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, we find that notwithstanding the gentleman's earnest opposition that bill did pass the House. Now, I remember that in the debate that ensued upon the consideration of the bill the gentleman did urge certain considerations which appealed with great persuasive force to me why his grant might be exempted with some degree of propriety from the operation of the bill. That was because he said, and it was stated with great force, that while the people of the North had opportunities and means for constructing railroads and complying with the terms of the land grants bestowed upon the Northern States or upon corporations for that purpose, the South was a sufferer from the devastation of war which had swept over her bosom as a broom of fire, destroying her resources, and consequently disabling and preventing her from constructing improvements of this character. I felt moved, I confess, to such a degree by his representations that I was almost tempted to palter with the pledge I had made on coming here, and which was embodied in the platform on which I ran, namely, to declare the forfeiture and restore to the public domain of every grant of unearned land.

Mr. COBB. Under the law.

Mr. HENLEY. Why, then, Representatives, should we trifle with this great question? I admonish the gentleman from Mississippi that the law passed by the last Legislature of his own State, much as we respect it, asking an extension of time on this land grant, amounts simply to an invocation addressed to Congress to deviate from the pledges made by these members to the people of this country—something which we can not afford to grant. This question, which was one of great import in the last Congress, has grown and increased in fervor and intensity, until the man who stands up and undertakes to stem it or defy it, the man who attempts to deviate from the obligations incumbent upon him from the platform upon which he ran, will meet with that fate which the faithless public servant ought to meet.

Now, I do not propose to criticise or to arraign or impugn the motives of others in respect to these matters. Each Representative must be the judge of his own action, being responsible to his constituency, and must be guided by his own individual conscientious convictions; but as for myself, whenever an opportunity is presented to abide by these pledges and to uphold and maintain the inviolability of the political platform upon which I was elected I intend to do that thing.

Mr. MORGAN. May I ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, was recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely wish to ask the gentleman from California a question.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I will yield for that.

Mr. MORGAN. As I understand the gentleman from California, he stands by the platform in favor of the forfeiture of unearned land grants. I ask if he will in any manner depart from his platform, if he will consent to give these parties a hearing?

Mr. HENLEY. No, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all that is asked here. The exception is made only to give an opportunity to be heard in this matter.

Mr. HENLEY. I have no objection to that, but I think there is more in it than that.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all that is contained in the proposition before the House.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I yield to my colleague for a moment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to this discussion. I did not have an opportunity of hearing the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] in his opening remarks, and I did not quite understand the bill. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], in that forcible manner in which he usually makes his arguments, satisfied my mind as to the bill, and, as I believe, satisfied the minds of every member on this floor. It occurs to me then that inasmuch as everybody is satisfied the bill will pass, and I expect it will if the debate ever closes; that is to say, if we have an opportunity of showing how valiant we will be when something else turns up, either in this or some other Congress, to be valiant about.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. This is a bill for the forfeiture of five or six land grants. Now, if there were no possible question in regard to any of these grants except in regard to one particular one as to whether the lands were earned or unearned, I could see good reason why we should except that particular grant as to which debate may arise and pass without debate the others. But in answer to a question which I addressed to my colleague of the committee [Mr. PAYSON], and afterward to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON], I was informed, as I understand, that there is no distinction whatever between this grant and the other grants covered by the bill as to the question whether the lands have been in fact earned or unearned.

Mr. VAN EATON. The gentleman misunderstood me then.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to be corrected if I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. VAN EATON. I desired to say as plainly as I could that as regarded all the other roads the grants to which this bill proposes to forfeit the States had never claimed the grants for the roads; no wish was ever expressed to get the benefit of these other grants; while in this particular case the people and the Legislature of the State of Mississippi have been asking and begging for this land ever since the war.

Mr. RYAN. But that does not earn the land.

Mr. VAN EATON. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] to say there was no difference as regarded the question whether the lands should be forfeited between this and the other grants; that there was no difference as to the equities between them.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is substantially my statement. But I did not make the question turn on a legal definition of unearned grants. I meant that the reasons the gentleman would probably give for the passage of the bill when it came before the House would be reasons addressed to the consideration of this House on grounds of public policy, whether the interests of the country required that road to be built to a sufficient degree to justify the House of Representatives giving to that road some of the public lands of the United States.

Mr. VAN EATON. That is exactly the question which I wish to submit to the House when the proper time comes.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. And that is the main question on which the fate of the bill will turn when it comes to the House.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] who now holds the floor I wish to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] why that matter can not just as well be settled on the pending amendment as on the original bill. I desire also to inquire how many miles of this road have been actually constructed?

Mr. STRUBLE. And when it was commenced?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes; the gentleman can state also when it was commenced.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I have yielded to the gentleman from Iowa to ask his question, and I yield also to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] to answer if he chooses.

Mr. VAN EATON. Will the gentleman from Iowa restate his question?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I wish to ask the gentleman why the rights of that company can not be just as well determined by a vote on the amendment now pending as by a vote on the other bill. Secondly, I ask him how much work has been completed on that line of road, when it was commenced, and when did the work cease?

Mr. VAN EATON. I will answer the gentleman's question. The reason the bill can not be considered upon its merits now is that the committee are considering it and have not yet reported upon it. The only report they have made with reference to it is the amendment they recommend to this bill, that this forfeiture be stricken out of this bill. They are now considering the other bill and will report; and the friends of the measure are only discussing the merits of the proposition to drop this road out of the present bill, in order that we may present the matter more fully and more fairly before the House when the report of the committee comes in.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There is one part of my question which the gentleman has not answered. How many miles have been completed?

Mr. VAN EATON. I am perfectly frank to say—none. I have never contended there were. I did say, however, that work has commenced and that hands are at work on the line of the survey.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. When were they put there?

Mr. VAN EATON. Three or four months ago.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I think I will now continue my remarks. I am not in the habit of occupying the floor long and I desire to get through.

It still remains clear to my mind that, if not the sole question, still the main question will be, when the bill now pending before the committee comes before the House, whether on grounds of public policy and not on grounds of national faith incurred it is wise to grant these lands to this company for the construction of this road. I declare here that after the long lapse of time since the policy of land grants to railroads has been inaugurated it has become more and more clear to the minds of the American people that that policy, however wise it may have been twenty years ago, should never be entered upon again, and I considered the vote upon the pending bill or upon the amendment now before the House to be an indication as to the intentions of this House in regard to entering once more upon that policy, out of which so much evil and injustice have come. I will say if the question turns on contracts heretofore made between the people and this corporation I, for one, would not confine the company to the strict letter of the law.

I can not say what rule could govern me, except that it would be the rule æquum et bonum—the rule of fair and square dealing, which should apply as well between a government and a corporation as between man and man. But I can not see the likelihood that any such question will arise, and I am unwilling by my vote, either upon an amendment like this or upon the bill when it comes before the House, to indicate that I, for one, will ever sanction the reinauguration of the policy of railroad land grants.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman mean to be understood that an affirmative or a negative vote upon the pending amendment will be an adjudication by this House upon a question which the committee intend to bring in here later by another bill?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I do not mean to say that, Mr. Speaker; but I do mean to say that I have evidence that that will be the question before the House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is it before the House now in this bill?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. It is, in my mind, when I see that here is a bill covering six land grants and a proposition is made to strike out one of them, and it is not alleged that there is any reason arising out of justice for striking out that particular land grant.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I understand that the committee have unanimously voted for the forfeiture of five of the land grants embraced in this bill, and have so reported to this House, and that they themselves bring in a report unanimously excepting from the provisions of the bill this one land grant, upon which they are not yet ready to report.

Mr. VAN EATON. That is true.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then, if I understand the matter correctly, an affirmative vote for this bill in no way commits any member of this House upon the vital questions which are involved in the bill that is to come before the House later. I was absent when the bill was referred, but I want to understand it. Am I correct?

Mr. VAN EATON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I understand that perfectly well, Mr. Speaker, but I understand that if this amendment were defeated and the bill passed in its present shape the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] could then introduce a bill proposing a land grant from the people of the United States to build this particular road by this corporation.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, nearly everything that I thought of saying has been covered by the questions propounded by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON]. The only question that we have to consider now is whether it is policy to vote upon the forfeiture of these land grants about which there is no question and leave the one about which there is question for future consideration. We are certainly ready to vote upon the forfeiture of the land grants about which there is no question. There are no equities presented to the House by any one in favor of these grants about which no question is made; but the whole question arises in relation to the one which the committee desire to exempt for the present from the provisions of this bill.

A MEMBER. Why do they want to do that?

Mr. PETERS. As I understand it, in order that they may examine the question further and may report upon it separately. I will say frankly that if I thought for a moment that a vote for this bill would be regarded by the adherents of the Gulf and Ship Island land grant as "first blood" in favor of that grant, I would vote against the whole bill; but I asked the question distinctly of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON], and he stated that no action that we could take upon this bill could in any event prejudice action upon the other bill in relation to that grant.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that we have all the facts now before the House concerning the land grant referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON]. We know all the points that can be made in its favor, and I can see no necessity for deferring action upon it until it comes before us in another bill; while on the other hand a vote in favor of this amendment will be taken as a precedent by the country, if not by the House, and as a vote in favor of continuing that grant.

Mr. PETERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, in answer to that I want to say that the very reason the committee give for excepting this one grant from the bill is that they have not yet fully considered the facts in connection with it. Therefore this House is not yet fully in possession of the facts of the case, and what the committee desire and what the House desire is that further time may be given the committee to complete their investigation and make their report to the House.

Mr. VAN EATON. Now you have hit it. [Cries of "Vote!" Vote!"]

Mr. PETERS. I am not in favor of precipitating action upon that question before the committee have fully made up their minds and reported their conclusions to the House.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But, Mr. Speaker, we have this prominent fact, that thirty years have elapsed since this land grant was made and not one particle of earth has yet been turned on the line of that road for the purpose of its construction. We have that fact, and that is enough.

Mr. PETERS. That fact is admitted by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON], but there are other questions that go especially to the equitable phase of the case, and that have not yet been brought before the committee or the House. [Renewed cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] what is the necessity of exempting this one case from the operation of this bill. Why not let the land grants all stand together and all be investigated and embraced in one bill?

Mr. PETERS. As to the land grants upon which the committee has reported, there are no equities pending in their favor, while it is claimed that in this case there are equities.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman whether the "equity" in this case is not a mere hope that Congress will in the future confirm this land grant.

Mr. PETERS. I can not say just what the equities are in this case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] yielded the floor.

Mr. PETERS. I have done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has been recognized and will proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, beginning in line 40, the words "to sale, disposition, and settlement under existing law, as though said acts and parts of acts had never been enacted," and insert the following: "To entry and settlement under provisions of the homestead laws by actual settlers only: Provided, however, That if sales of any of said lands have heretofore been made by the United States, such sales are hereby confirmed."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few words. I understand that some of these lands have been sold by the United States. When it was supposed the grant had been forfeited by the failure of the corporations to complete their respective railways the lands were open for a time for sale, and some entries had been made before the decision of the Supreme Court on the subject. As to those lands, of course it is proper that the sales should be confirmed; but as to the rest of these lands, several million of acres, I submit that they ought to be subject to the provisions of the homestead laws only. It may be said that a general law will be passed upon this subject confining the disposal of all the public lands to the homestead laws. I sincerely trust such a law will be enacted at an early moment; but no such law has yet been passed, and no one can safely predict the course of legislation, and I hope that as far as the lands now in question are concerned and all lands hereafter declared forfeited the House will carefully provide that they shall be disposed of only under the homestead laws, whether they are specially adapted to agriculture or are mainly valuable on account of their timber. I trust that the expression made upon this subject, not only in the last Congress but by the great parties of the country and the whole people, in favor of this mode of disposing of the public lands in securing freeholds to the greatest number, will control our action in the present Congress until that policy is applied to all public lands.

One word more on the main question before the House. The proposed amendment exempting from forfeiture one of the grants in question, the Gulf and Ship Island grant, seems to me to be well and fully understood by the House. Every question connected with it is now, I think, as well understood as it can be from any future discussion. The whole subject is well understood by the House. There is clearly no occasion for omitting a portion of the land on the theory that further information is required.

The House is fully informed as to the facts. The equities are well understood. The grant which was made in 1856 was long since forfeited. The railroad has never been constructed. The lands were never actually withdrawn until a comparatively recent date. The question is whether those lands shall now be subject to disposal for the benefit of the whole people, or whether the provisions of the grant shall be allowed to operate after the lapse of thirty years. I trust that the House, upon the statement made by my friend from Mississippi himself—taking his words just as they have been delivered so frankly to the House—will see that no new fact can be developed; the right of Congress to declare the forfeiture has not been and can not be denied. The question is simply one as to the equities that may arise, and every gentleman understands exactly what those equities which would excuse the great lapse of time are. This exception proposed by the committee if now made will be construed by the country as virtually not merely a postponement but an indication on the part of the House that it will not abide by the principle laid down by the last Congress, that lands subject to be forfeited shall be forfeited and shall be restored to the people of the United States.

These lands are subject to forfeiture. No gentleman questions that. My friend from Mississippi does not question that. Why not, therefore, declare the forfeiture? The passage of this bill in the form proposed by the committee will create an impression that this exception implies a purpose to abandon the principle already laid down by Congress and demanded by the country, that all forfeited land grants shall be declared forfeited and the lands opened up to bona fide settlement. I trust my friend from Mississippi will see the fairness of the House determining now and at once whether or not this particular grant shall be exempted from the forfeiture which the last House of Representatives declared with such general unanimity.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss for a single moment the policy of this amendment. In my judgment, it ought not to be put on this bill. It tends to encumber the bill. The very reason why the committee omitted the Gulf and Ship Island grant was that we wanted this bill to go through with certainty, not only in this House but in the Senate. In the last Congress we passed a bill of this kind embracing in its terms the Gulf and Ship Island grant. That bill went to the Senate and was defeated, or, at least, Congress closed without its becoming a law.

Now, I insist that a bill forfeiting land grants ought not to be encumbered with this legislation amending the general law. I believe this bill ought to stand upon its merits, and I do not think that there is much merit in the amendment proposed by my colleague—I say this with great respect for him—because the amendment may, and I believe will, encumber the bill. When it goes to the Senate his amendment, if adopted here, will be stricken out; and then when the measure comes back here we shall have to pass it without the amendment or have a controversy with the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me a single question?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not every acre of the lands covered by this bill subject, if restored to the public domain, to entry by any single man who may think proper to enter it at the minimum price fixed by law without regard to settlement?

Mr. COBB. I have said that. The general law gives that right. The gentleman proposes to amend the general law in this bill, and thereby jeopardize the passage of the bill. I am as much in favor of this provision as he is if it were presented as a separate proposition or if accompanied with other propositions connected with the pre-emption, homestead, or timber-culture laws; but when we have a bill involving six or eight million acres of land that the people need and ought to have, I am not in favor of encumbering such a measure with amendments that will not perhaps be satisfactory to many members here and at the other end of the Capitol. I trust, therefore, that the House will not put the gentleman's amendment on the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. But will my friend answer me a further question? Would it not be better that these eight or nine million acres should remain for the present tied up just as they are now than that they should be subject, as the gentleman understands all those lands are—I do not say all lands—to unlimited entry at the minimum price of public lands?

Mr. COBB. No, sir; I say not, most emphatically. I do not believe that these lands ought to be tied up for a thousand years, as the gentleman insists. I believe they should be forfeited now. And let the general law be amended in the proper way. We have lived under that general law for years; the gentleman has served in Congress for twenty years with the law standing as it does now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have been trying to amend it for twenty years, and I am trying to amend it now upon this particular bill.

Mr. COBB. I do not like to have the gentleman undertake to amend the general law according to his own judgment upon a bill in which I feel so much interest as I do in this bill. I would rather he should bring in his proposition separately and let it stand on its own merits. Then I will vote with him, but I shall vote against his amendment now.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] to answer one question for the information of the House—whether under the law as it now stands these lands, which it is proposed by this bill to forfeit, might be sold in bulk to one man at $1.25 an acre?

Mr. COBB. Why, that has been the law for years and years.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been the law as to the lands embraced in the bill since the repeal of the special homestead act of 1866.

Mr. COBB. These lands will have to be reoffered by the Interior Department; there is no question about that. They have been withdrawn from market. They may have been offered heretofore at public sale; but they must be offered again at public sale before they can be bought by private individuals otherwise than at public sale. That is the law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A different law applies in this case from that which applies to the public domain?

Mr. COBB. No, sir; not at all. These lands will become a part of the public domain; and they will stand just as the original public domain does stand. An offer at public sale will be necessary before the lands can be entered by private purchasers; they can be homesteaded without that.

Mr. EDEN and Mr. CANNON rose.

Mr. COBB. I will first hear my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to allow me to appeal to his colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] not to embarrass the bill by amendments, thereby indirectly benefiting the railroad companies. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. I have been appealing to him myself. [Laughter and cries of "Vote!"] I will now hear the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN].

Mr. EDEN. The inquiry I desire to make is whether in the provisions of this bill there is any limit as to the amount a single purchaser may buy?

Mr. COBB. At public sale? As the gentleman is aware, under the general law the lands must be offered in several parcels of 40-acre tracts. If there are no bidders they go down upon the list to be entered by private purchasers.

Mr. RYAN. Without limitation as to the number of acres?

Mr. COBB. I presume so, after public offering has been had. That has been the rule of law for a quarter of a century, I believe, or longer. [Cries of "Vote!"] I now demand the previous question on the pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand the previous question on the pending amendments or on the engrossment and third reading of the bill?

Mr. COBB. I will demand the previous question on the engrossment of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The question first recurred on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HAMMOND. The amendments have been read but can not be well understood without our seeing them in print, and as this is an important question, if the gentleman will not insist on a vote now I will move the House adjourn. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] I move the House do now adjourn.

The House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on the following amendment, reported by the Committee on the Public Lands:

In line 14, after the word "act," insert: "Also except so much of said act as relates to grant of lands in aid of a railroad from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico, commonly known as the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 81.

Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House refused to adjourn.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 83, nays 179, not voting 61; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CROXTON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague Mr. BARBOUR is absent from the House on account of serious illness.

On motion of Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. WARD, of Indiana, with Mr. NELSON.

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. GROUT.

Mr. LE FEVRE with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. MAYBURY with Mr. GOFF.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am paired on political questions, but have voted, not considering this a political question.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Would it be in order now to move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this stage of the bill. That motion will be in order when the previous question is demanded or ordered upon the passage of the bill.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was read, as follows:

Strike out in the bill all after the word "subject" and insert "to entry and settlement under the provisions of the homestead laws and by actual settlers only: Provided, however, That if sales of any of said lands have heretofore been made by the United States such sales are hereby confirmed."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 116, noes 27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands, in order that they may consider the subject-matter embodied in the amendment. They have reported here that they have not considered that matter.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman is mistaken. The committee reported no such thing.

Mr. MORGAN. It has been so stated upon the floor of the House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The bill was passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRUMM. Pending that I ask unanimous consent——[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The motion of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. J. M. ALLEN: Papers relating to the claims of David Pressly and of Rebecca Montgomery—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BAYNE: Papers relating to the claim of John T. Oates—to the same committee.

By Mr. BINGHAM: Resolutions of the Ministerial Association of Pottsville, Pa., requesting the passage of stringent laws to prevent the use of the United States mails in carrying newspapers and other periodicals containing lottery advertisements or other notice of lotteries—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BRADY: Papers in the case of Daniel Williamson—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: Petition of Andrew Sebring and 238 others, ex-soldiers and citizens of Delaware County, Indiana, for a service pension for the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1861-'64, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 28, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CAPITOL, NORTH O STREET AND SOUTH WASHINGTON RAILWAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company, transmiting a statement of the operations of that company for the fiscal years ending April 30, 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of James Ryback, of Baltimore, Md., praying to be allowed his share in the distribution of the Geneva award; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Jackson Local Assembly, No. 822, Knights of Labor, of Ohio, praying the organization of a Territorial form of government for the Indian Territory and the opening of the lands therein to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of B. C. Sargent and other citizens of Maine, praying for legislation prohibiting the landing or importation of certain fish caught between March 1 and June of the same year; which was referred to the Committee on Fish and Fisheries.

Mr. JACKSON presented the petition of Everett Ritter, of Buena Vista, Carroll County, Tennessee, praying that the charge of desertion against his two sons, John and Henry Ritter, late privates in Company E, Seventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, may be removed; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present the petition of F. P. Hysham and 19 other citizens of Dakota, praying for the absolute forfeiture of the unearned lands within the limits of the grant to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company. Inasmuch as the bill on that subject has been reported from the appropriate committee, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of W. C. Evans and 7 other citizens of Iowa, praying for the passage of a joint resolution submitting to the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for the protection of women of all the States and Territories in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which was referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

He also presented a petition of the Local Assembly of the Knights of Labor, of Grinnell, Iowa, praying for the organization of a Territorial form of government over the Indian Territory and the opening of public lands therein to settlement under the homestead laws; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAWES. Was the petition just presented by the Senator from Iowa referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was so referred.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It has reference to the organization of a Territorial government for the Indian Territory, and I supposed the Committee on Indian Affairs would desire to consider it primarily, whatever may be the ultimate reference.

Mr. DAWES. They have now a bill before them referred to them by order of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. There have been petitions presented from certain posts of the Knights of Labor asking that the lands in the Indian Territory may be thrown open to settlement, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, whereas they should have gone to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The petition presented by me embraced both subjects, the organization of a Territorial government and the opening of the public lands to settlement.

Mr. INGALLS. There can be no question that petitions relating to the opening of the Indian Territory to settlement ought to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs as the committee properly having jurisdiction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas make that motion?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that reference will be considered as agreed to, and all such petitions heretofore presented will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Protective Local Assembly No. 222, Knights of Labor, of Pennsylvania, praying for the opening of unoccupied lands in the Indian Territory to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Iron Manufacturers' Association at a meeting held in Philadelphia, Pa., January 13, 1886, remonstrating against a revision of the tariff; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PALMER presented the memorial of the board of control of State swamp land, of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 122) to quiet and confirm the title to certain lands in Saginaw Bay, in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FRYE. I have a resolution of the Portland (Me.) Typographical Union, addressed to me, but in the nature of a petition. It relates to a copyright bill. I ask that it be received and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the paper will be received and so referred.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of Mary Luckett, of Baltimore, Md., praying to be granted compensation for property taken by the United States Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the petition of P. Cudmore, of Faribault, Rice County, Minnesota, praying the allowance of pensions to ex-Union soldiers and their widows and orphan children from the time of the discharge of such soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. I present two petitions, very numerously signed by citizens of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia, praying for an extension of the Capitol, North O street and South Washington Railway in accordance with certain bills now pending on that subject. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I also present a petition, signed by Dr. A. T. Augusta, J. H. Rainey, Frederick Douglass, John R. Francis, and other eminent and well-known citizens of this District, complaining of the discriminations that are now practiced in this community against citizens of African descent at theaters and other places of entertainment, and asking that the license laws of the District may be so amended as to prevent such discriminations hereafter. The petition is accompanied by affidavits and letters from gentlemen of the highest respectability, which leave no doubt that these discriminations are practiced, and that to this extent the provisions of the act granting equal rights to all citizens of the United States are nullified here. I move that the petition, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report an original bill. It is done in this form to avoid the expense of printing a useless former bill and leaving this as a substitute.

The bill (S. 1265) to authorize the acquisition of certain parcels of real estate embraced in square No. 406 of the city of Washington, for the enlargement of the Post-Office Department building, and to provide accommodations for the city post-office, was read twice by its title.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 632) to provide for the settlement of the estates of deceased Kickapoo Indians in the State of Kansas, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred to bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to state that the report just made from the Committee on Indian Affairs is not a unanimous report, as objection is made to so much of section 7 of that bill as makes citizens of Indians. I give notice that I do not assent to the report as made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 526) for the relief of women and children who were wives or minors of Federal officers or soldiers, and who were taken captive by hostile Indians during the late Southern rebellion, commencing A. D. 1861, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 26) relative to a certain accepted draft in the Department of State, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1116) for the erection of a public building at Pueblo, Colo., reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments:

A bill (S. 86) to provide for the construction of a public building at Portland, Oreg.; and

A bill (S. 479) to provide for the erection of a post-office building at Fortress Monroe, Va.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 175) for a public building at Monroe, La.;

A bill (S. 763) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa;

A bill (S. 549) for a public building at Greenville, S. C.;

A bill (S. 57) for the erection of a public building at Oshkosh, Wis.; and

A bill (S. 179) to provide a building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, custom-office, and internal-revenue office at Vicksburg, Miss.

STATUES OF COLUMBUS AND LA FAYETTE.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report a concurrent resolution, which I ask may be read.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the circle at the western entrance to the Capitol grounds from Pennsylvania avenue shall be, and hereby is, forever set apart as a site for a statue of Christopher Columbus, and the circle at the western entrance to the Capitol grounds from Maryland avenue, shall also be, and hereby is, forever set apart as a site for a statue of the Marquis de La Fayette; and the naval monument, now standing upon the circle first herein mentioned, shall be removed and placed upon the triangular reservation bounded by Connecticut avenue, Twentieth street, and Q street.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask to have the concurrent resolution printed and laid upon the table. To-morrow morning I shall seek an opportunity to have it considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, and the resolution will lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1266) for the relief of James F.

Hogan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1267) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Lou Gobright McFalls; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1268) for the relief of Benjamin F. Spates; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1269) to create a commission for the adjudication and payment of certain unadjudicated claims filed before the late Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1270) for the erection of a public building at Lowell, Mass.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1273) to allow John Winchell arrears of pension; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 1274) for the relief of Edward L. Keyes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1275) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the original petitioners in the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims in lieu of their assignees in bankruptcy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1276) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar, and to restore its legal-tender quality," passed February 28, 1878; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORRILL and others. Let the bill be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the coinage of the silver dollar provided for by the first section of the act to which this is an amendment be discontinued from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion in bars, not less than nine-tenths fine, at the market price thereof, not less than 2,000,000 ounces troy per month nor more than 4,000,000 ounces troy per month, and shall issue in payment therefor coin certificates of the United States in denominations of not less than $10 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes; and the bullion so purchased shall be retained in the Treasury for the security and for the payment of the same; and the amount of such certificates at any time outstanding shall not exceed the cost of the bullion purchased by such certificates; and the certificates thus issued shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the said certificates on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York in sums not less than $50.

SEC. 3. That any holder of standard silver dollars or gold coin of the United States or gold bullion at its mint value may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums not less than $10, and receive coin certificates therefor similar in denomination and legal effect to the certificates provided for in the preceding section. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1277) to refund duties paid by the State of New York on arms imported in 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1278) to provide for the adjustment of certain accounts of Edwin A. Merritt, late consul-general at London, for storage and care of the archives at that consulate-general; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLUMB (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1279) to forfeit lands granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Marquette to Ontonagon, in said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1280) to grant the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1281) for the relief of Hugo Wedeles; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1282) to reimburse the officers and crew of the United States arctic exploring steamer Jeannette for loss of baggage and personal effects; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1283) granting a pension to Hugh Jonson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MAXEY. I yesterday introduced a bill (S. 1240) for the relief of Alice E. Culver, administratrix of the estate of F. B. Culver, deceased. I now beg leave to present, to be filed and referred to the Committee on Claims, a letter of appointment by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, certifying that Alice E. Culver was appointed the executrix of Frederick B. Culver, deceased. I ask that it may be considered in connection with the bill, and that the committee amend the bill in accordance with the letter of appointment of the executrix.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Edward L. Keyes (S. 1798, second session Forty-eighth Congress) be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TREASURY CONSCIENCE FUND.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate as to the origin of what is known as the "conscience fund" in the Treasury of the United States, the amount of the same, and what disposition is made thereof.

REMOVAL OF JUDGES.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill for the retirement or removal of judges of the district and circuit courts when, from any cause, they shall become subject to any permanent disability and unable to perform the duties of their office, discriminating between disability because of drunkenness or the excessive use of intoxicating drinks, so that disability of this kind may be punished by impeachment and removal from office.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That all railroad land grants heretofore made where the land was not earned by the completion of the line of railroad and the performance of the conditions required by the granting act within the time required therein, and where the time has not been extended by an act of Congress, or shall not hereafter be extended, shall be declared forfeited and opened to homestead entry and cash entry in small bodies, securing to actual settlers the preferred right in all cases to make entries of their homes to the extent of 160 acres, and confirming to all purchasers of town-sites, where lots have been sold and improvements made, their title to the same.

And the Committee on Public Lands is hereby instructed to report a bill to this effect to the Senate.

MARTIN KENOFSKY.

Mr. GIBSON. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (1219) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenofsky, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT BANK TAXES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], which now comes up in its order. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. VAN WYCK:

Whereas it is alleged that the national banks in the District of Columbia have at no time since the enactment of the banking law paid local taxes in said District: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to investigate as to the above allegation, and report what legislation, if any, is necessary to require the payment of taxes by said corporations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

STREET-RAILWAY BUILDINGS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK]. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. VAN WYCK:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to confer with the Architect of the Capitol, and report whether suitable buildings can be erected at the street-railway stations on the public grounds east of the Capitol without detriment to the said grounds, to be used for the employés of said railways. Also to report what legislation is necessary to require the companies owning said railways to construct such buildings pursuant to the plans to be furnished by said Architect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CALL. I ask as a question of personal privilege to make a statement that it may go into the RECORD. I find in the Weekly Louisville Courier-Journal of the 11th of January the following:

Senator CALL, the new Florida representative, submitted a bill in the Senate Tuesday which provides that any circuit or district judge who becomes disabled through drunkenness or any other cause shall be retired on a salary of $2,000. Any young lawyer under this bill of CALL's who can secure an appointment as Federal judge would be enabled to secure a yearly pension of $2,000 by making himself a sot pro hac vice, and when he gets his reward, which would have a capital value of about $35,000, he may sober up and live the remainder of his life as a gentleman at the expense of Uncle Sam. This is only one of the avenues to wealth and ease offered by the bill of the Florida Senator. The enterprising Federal judge may get his $2,000 pension if he can succeed in acquiring a precious disability from any cause. This condition creates an opening for some other accomplishments even more distinguishing than sottishness of habit.

This statement of the Courier-Journal, which is a leading journal, has been copied in a great many papers in different States throughout the Union which have been sent to me.

I wish to state, so that it may go into the RECORD, that no such bill as that described in this article has been presented by me or any one else. No one who has intelligence enough to keep himself outside of a lunatic asylum will so construe the bill which I have presented as to produce by any possibility such results as those stated in this article.

I have introduced a bill providing that the Federal judge who is guilty of drunkenness while in the discharge of his duty, or the judge who is innocently disabled from any cause, shall be retired upon a judicial inquiry and ascertainment of the fact at the instance of the Attorney-General, and approved by the President, until he can be removed by impeachment and permanently relieved from the discharge of his duties by the forfeiture of his office and salary.

I desired this statement to be made in order that the public may be informed that the bill is intended as a punishment for drunkenness, and as a security and protection to the community that may be afflicted with such a judge. Its provisions secure this result by the immediate suspension and retirement of the offending and disabled judge, and, so far as any law can do it, his impeachment and removal.

The statement that a "young man may secure an appointment and become a sot pro hac vice, and when he gets his reward, which would have a capital value of $35,000, he may sober up and live the remainder of his life as a gentleman at the expense of Uncle Sam," is not only very absurd, but is made, singularly for a writer of editorials in so able a journal, in ignorance of the fact that by the Constitution impeachment and conviction by the Senate removes a judge from office and from the payment of his salary.

The statement also requires that the "young man shall not only make himself a sot pro hac vice," but also that he shall make the Attorney-General, and the judge who tries the cause, and the President who approves the judgment, and the Congress that fail to impeach and convict—all must on this proposition be made "sots" by this enterprising "young man" in search of a fortune at the expense of the Government by this newly discovered method of getting rich.

By the law as it now stands a poor man is liable to be tried in the United States courts, with his life and liberty involved, before a judge suffering under either innocent or culpable disability, and he has no right of appeal from the judgment of such judge; and if the disability be an innocent one such a judge is not subject to any proceeding of any kind for his suspension and removal; and the judge suffering from culpable disability may, under the law as it now stands, draw his full salary for life and improperly perform the duties of his office or refuse to perform them without interference unless he should be impeached, which is almost impossible and certainly very improbable. So much, Mr. President, for this statement which has gone the rounds of the newspapers, which is as entirely without reason as it is harsh and unjust.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 392) declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SIOUX RESERVATION IN DAKOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is now in order under the eighth rule, and the first business on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 52) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 11 of the first section of the proposed amendment it is moved to strike out the words "homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims" and insert "by actual settlement and improvement of any portion of such lands;" so as to read:

That all persons who, between the 27th day of February, 1885, and the 17th day of April, 1885, in good faith entered upon any part of the Great Sioux reservation lying east of the Missouri River, and known as the Crow Creek and Winnebago reservation, which by the President's proclamation of date February 27, 1885, was declared to be open to settlement, and not included in the new reservation established by section 6 of this act, and who located thereon by actual settlement and improvement of any portion of such lands, shall, for a period of ninety days after the proclamation of the President required to be made by section 22 of this act, have a right to re-enter upon said claims and complete the same as required by law, &c.

Mr. INGALLS. In what condition will that leave this land? If it is not to be located under the provisions of the homestead, pre-emption, or town-site laws, how is title to be acquired except by actual purchase, for which there seems to be no provision made?

Mr. PLUMB. That would come in subsequently. If this amendment is adopted a subsequent amendment will be perhaps necessary, although it may not be. But at all events, if it shall be found necessary, it can be easily drawn. I have another amendment that I intend to propose.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to have the subsequent amendment reported so that I may vote intelligently on the entire subject. I myself have always believed that the disposition of these reservations, which have been rendered valuable by adjacent settlement after being long reserved from occupation, under the pre-emption and homestead laws, was a mistaken policy. It is practically impossible to leave lands that are in such a condition fairly open to the operation of the homestead and pre-emption laws. They ought to be appraised and sold, for the reason that they have an enormously enhanced value in consequence of the settlements adjacent to the reservation and the advantages which railroads and other means of communication have given to those who become entitled to locate thereon.

So I should be glad to vote that the provisions of the homestead and pre-emption laws should not apply to those attempting to obtain settlement on this reservation; but if that is to be abolished, before voting upon that proposition I should like to know under what provision of law title is to be acquired.

Mr. PLUMB. The purpose of this amendment is simply to give further specification to the class of persons who are to be entitled to the benefit of this measure. It is not at all necessary, as I think, to consider now in this connection what further rights we will give them. We are only now prescribing the character of persons who are to be entitled to preference in regard to entry by reason of their having heretofore entered upon these lands under a mistake.

When we come to the question of the disposition of the lands I mean to propose an amendment limiting the selection in a manner which will not be agreeable to my colleague, judging by the remarks which he has just uttered. But that is a question, as I said, by itself. Everybody seems to agree that a certain portion at least of those persons who went onto these lands under the belief that the proclamation of the President of February last was legal should have some preference right in regard to the lands which they settled upon, so far at least as they are now opened to settlement by the terms of this bill; and I desire, in order to prevent preference being given to speculators, to limit this preference to the persons who made actual improvement on the land with a view to settlement.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me to interrupt him, would not his purpose be accomplished by leaving in the section the words "homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims" and inserting after them the words he suggests, so as to read:

And who located thereon homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims by actual settlement and improvement of any portion of such lands?

Mr. PLUMB. I think that town sites ought to go out anyhow. In the next place, I think the pre-emption claims ought to go out also, because I believe the bill ought to have a uniform operation, and if the remainder of these lands are to be opened to homestead settlement alone, these particular lands should be open to similar settlement; and, of course, to that settlement is to be attached the payment of 50 cents an acre. My purpose, however, in making this proposition, was to cut out a class of people, whom my colleague described so felicitously yesterday, who had not made any settlement on these lands. While I am on this subject, I desire to call attention to the fact that in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings, as found on page 914, the stenographer made me utter these words:

In other words, I distinguish between pirates and settlers.

I used no such term at all. I am not surprised that the stenographer made such an error, because errors of that kind are constantly made and of even a grosser character, but I call attention to it now to simply disown the utterance of any such language. I did not attribute any piratical character to the class of people who went upon these lands and who did not make the actual valid settlement which I was endeavoring to describe. As it was a very harsh term, I have thought it worth while now to depart from my custom and disavow it.

Mr. HARRISON. In framing the amendment which I have proposed I did not intend to express any opinion as to whether it was wise as a matter of general policy to continue the pre-emption law in force. If it is pertinent to express any opinion of my own on that subject, I am willing to say that I believe that law should be repealed, and I would be glad if all the remaining lands of the Government should be subject to disposition only under the homestead law; but the pre-emption law and the town-site law are parts of our present land system, and they were when the proclamation of President Arthur declared these lands to be open to settlement. Therefore it was the right of any settler to go upon these lands and make a pre-emption claim. The proclamation invited him to do it; the law authorized him to do it. Now, if we confine this amendment to homestead entries, we deny to those people a legal right which they exercised last spring in making their entries. We can not do that unless we compensate them for the losses they suffered; and if this amendment is so framed as that it will allow homestead entries, then it must be so amended that every man who attempted a pre-emption entry there or a town-site entry shall be paid his losses in not being allowed to consummate the entry.

This is perfectly clear. It is no time now to be talking about whether we like pre-emption claims or town-site claims or not. The law authorizes them to be made, and these people in good faith made them. If they did not make them in good faith they are not within the terms of my amendment. Having made them under the advice of the President, can we send them off that reservation without some just compensation for their losses? I think not, and therefore I framed this amendment so as to give to those settlers the rights which they had under the law then in force, and I do not see how it can be justly framed in any other way.

I am entirely willing that any amendment shall be inserted here which will prevent any false claim of any of these classes being consummated; that whatever the law required in the way of settlement and improvement shall be exacted of these people, and so I understand the amendment as it reads; but we can not turn these people off, who went there in good faith, without compensation. We must either compensate them or allow them to perfect the lawful entries which they made.

Mr. DAWES. I want to co-operate with the Senator in carrying out his view, but I confess a want of sufficient familiarity with the land laws to be able to determine. I should like to inquire of the Senator if there is any practical hardship in requiring a man who has made a pre-emption entry to conform it to a homestead entry afterward?

Mr. HARRISON. There is this trouble: A man can take but a single homestead entry, and the probability is that most of these men who sought to make a pre-emption entry had already exhausted their homestead right somewhere else, and unless we confer on them the right to make a new homestead there we destroy their claim altogether, unless we recognize it for what it was meant to be, namely, a pre-emption claim.

Mr. DAWES. Can a man take a pre-emption entry and a homestead entry at the same time? Does not the law require of him to live on both of them?

Mr. HARRISON. That may be true, and I do not intimate that these were taken at the same time. But suppose the case of a settler who years ago had taken in Iowa his homestead claim and therefore could take no other, and he goes on this reservation and makes a pre-emption claim. He had a right to do it when he went there.

Mr. DAWES. I am not going myself to do anything that will cut him out of any 160 acres that the law permitted him (assuming that proclamation to be legal) to take; but where a man years ago acquired a homestead by honestly and fairly living on land for five years, can he now anew take a pre-emption and live on that land five years? If that be so, such a case as that would not be met.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course he pays for his pre-emption claim, as the Senator knows, a dollar and a quarter an acre.

Mr. DAWES. Another inquiry I should like to make in regard to the town-site matter. I do not understand the law in that respect. Does any individual himself take a town site, and is he entitled to all the profits of cutting it up into town lots and selling it as town lots? If he takes land under an ordinary homestead or pre-emption right and then cuts it up into town lots, there is no necessity for this special provision; but if a man has bought a town site and put a town on that land, is he to have personally all that can be made out of the town lots?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator in this quest for information, which seems to be a pretty wide one, ought to turn to the Senator from Kansas who sits behind him and who is chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. PLUMB]. I have not been a very close student of the land laws of the United States; but the fact is this: Just on the north line of the town of Chamberlain American Creek enters the Missouri River. Across that creek the lands were within the Indian reservation. There is a fine plateau there adapted to the extension of the town of Chamberlain or to the location of a new town. I understand that a number of people in the town of Chamberlain getting together laid out a town site and took up perhaps 160 acres there for a town site; and under the law I understand no man takes more than 2 acres—I may be wrong about that. The most substantial improvements that were made upon the Crow Creek reservation were made on that town site, which is connected by a bridge with the town of Chamberlain. Some quite substantial and valuable houses were put up.

Mr. PLUMB. The object which the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to remind the Senator from Kansas that according to the rule under which the Senate is operating he can speak but once on a pending question.

Mr. PLUMB. I think somebody had better move to make this bill a special order for some date, so that it may be considered according to its importance.

Mr. DAWES. A motion to consider the bill will take it out of that order, and I make that motion.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us understand. This bill is limited in its consideration by the hour of 2 o'clock, is it not? Because if it is to be the regular order of business and go beyond that hour, I must object. With that understanding, I assent to the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that a motion to take the bill out of the eighth rule would not extend its consideration beyond 2 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that this bill be considered under the ninth rule; that is, be taken out of the operation of Rule VIII.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. The object which the Senator has in view, as expressed by him in his remarks a moment ago, was cut off by an amendment which he himself accepted yesterday, an amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I thought at the time that amendment ought not to go in, because it was not in harmony with the other provisions of the bill. If he would strike out the amendment which was inserted yesterday, to which I have referred, he would not find the difficulty which he is now confronted with in regard to a class of people who went upon these lands who had exhausted their right of homestead and pre-emption entry elsewhere.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not intend to provide for any such people. If they had exhausted both their homestead and their pre-emption right, then they had no business on this land at all, unless it was to take a lot in a town site.

Mr. PLUMB. I think myself that if they went on in good faith they ought to have the right to have the tract of land on which they located; but it is perfectly competent, and not only competent but I think entirely proper, that Congress should prescribe the character of the entry they shall make. It is in accordance with the general judgment, I think, of the country, in accordance with the judgment of both Houses of Congress as expressed at the last session, but in an ineffective way, in the passage of a similar measure through both Houses limiting entries on the public lands to homestead settlers.

Whoever went upon these lands as a pre-emption settler has no vested right whatever in any claim to enter that land by reason of a settlement of six months only, which is all that is required under the pre-emption law, and Congress may, without trespassing upon his rights, say he shall live there five years before he can acquire a title; and it has been a part of my purpose to amend this bill in such a way as to permit those who entered under the pre-emption law to take under the homestead law, subject only to the requirement that they shall live on the land a period of five years, as required by section 20 in regard to those who shall hereafter locate on the portion of the reservation thrown open by this bill to settlement.

Mr. HARRISON. If the bill is so extended that a settler who has already taken a homestead claim and is not entitled to another can take another homestead claim on this land, that having declared it to be a pre-emption claim he may transmute it into a homestead claim, then of course it protects all of these people except that it requires a longer period of residence, and instead of requiring the settler to pay a dollar and a quarter an acre into this fund it requires him to pay only 50 cents. That is the effect.

Mr. PLUMB. That makes the bill harmonious all the way through. Section 20 provides that any person being a citizen of the United States may enter upon the lands which are opened by this bill to settlement, not qualifying or limiting the right to persons who have not heretofore exercised the right of settlement on the public domain, but opening these lands indiscriminately to all the citizens of the United States. I thought it was proper that in view of the adoption of this provision of section 20 a similar provision should obtain in the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, and I believe that that is not only just to all those people, all they could in fairness require, but that it is consonant with high public policy and with the policy which we can not too soon adopt with regard to the disposition of all the public lands.

I believe therefore that the amendment which I have proposed should be adopted, limiting the right to be acquired under this bill to those persons who made actual settlement and improvement on the land, and that whoever goes back upon these lands by reason of this provision should live upon and acquire the land under and by virtue of the homestead law and not by virtue of the pre-emption law.

Now in regard to the town-site matter, that is perhaps not of much consequence, particularly if there was only one town site selected upon the land. My fear was that a number of town sites had been located there and that they would be acquired in such a way as not to answer the general purposes of the bill, and I thought perhaps that had better go out.

Under the town-site law of the United States the title is acquired by the county judge or by the chief municipal officer, the mayor or the chairman of the board of trustees, for the benefit of the occupants, of those persons who are settled upon and occupying the land. This law has been the subject of very extended discussion and of decisions by the courts of the United States and of the various States of the Union; and those decisions are to the effect that no land can be legally acquired under the town-site act by any one not actually an occupier of the land entered for town-site purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that it be read again.

The SECRETARY. After the word "thereon," at the end of line 10 of section 1 of the amendment, it is proposed to strike out the words "homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims" and insert "by actual settlement and improvement of any portion of such lands."

Mr. PLUMB. In order to have these questions taken separately, I will withdraw so much of my amendment as proposes to strike out "homestead, pre-emption, or town-site claims," leaving the proposition now simply to insert the words I have proposed, and then we can take the question afterward on striking out.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it would be well to divide it. Let the section be read as it would stand if these words were in.

The SECRETARY. After the word "claims," in line 11, it is proposed to insert "by actual settlement and improvement of any portion of such lands."

Mr. HARRISON. To that I make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment as modified.

Mr. TELLER. I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas that his amendment should be further amended so as to protect the pre-emptors who may not have the right of homestead but who are entitled to take pre-emption claims.

Mr. HARRISON. This does not relate to that.

Mr. TELLER. But will not this amendment cut out that class of people? Will it not be confined to people who are entitled to take a homestead?

Mr. HARRISON. It leaves in the words "pre-emption or town-site claims." It simply now requires some improvement.

Mr. TELLER. All right.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] is still open to amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend, on page 2, section 1, line 14 of the amendment, by inserting after the word "claim" the words "under the provisions of section 20 of this act." I shall subsequently move to strike out the words "by law," in line 15, and insert the word "therein." That, I think, will then, while leaving in the other words, accomplish all I have in view; that is, to require persons to prove up their claims under section 20, which practically requires a homestead settlement. Although it protects by name all persons who have made pre-emption and homestead and town-site entries, it requires them to prove up under section 20 of the act, which makes no limitation in regard to the class of persons who entered on public lands by reason of not having before settled upon them.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the effect of this amendment would be to prevent any one who has made a pre-emption entry from forfeiting his claim.

Section 20 is:

> That all the lands acquired by the provisions of this act, except American Island, Farm Island, and Niobrara Island, shall be disposed of by the United States to actual settlers only, under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States.

Now, how can a man who has taken a pre-emption entry prove up under the homestead laws of the United States? Under the homestead laws he is required to prove that he has never before taken a homestead.

Mr. INGALLS. Can a settler lawfully take a pre-emption claim on this reservation?

Mr. HARRISON. After it was opened by President Arthur's proclamation.

Mr. INGALLS. I think not.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to know why. It was open precisely as any other public land of the United States was open to settlement; and if the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is adopted it simply introduces a confusion here, the result of which in my judgment is to destroy any right of a pre-emptor to perfect his claim. He can not perfect his claim under the homestead law, for a part of his proof there is not only residence for five years, except for the provision in behalf of soldiers, but in addition to that he must make, as I understand, proof that he never before took a homestead at all on the public lands of the United States.

Mr. President, I do not want to consume time, but the trouble is here that these men entered there and made pre-emption claims, as they were lawfully authorized to do. The law requires pre-emptors to do certain things; they began the doing of those things, I assume in good faith, and having a right to do them; now what right have we to transmute their claim into some other kind of claim or to require of them some conditions that were not the conditions of law when they made the settlement, and what right have we as to the Indians for that matter to give these people who have already taken a homestead another 160 acres of land at 50 cents an acre, whereas under the pre-emption law they would be required, as I understand, to pay a dollar and a quarter an acre into this fund?

I appreciate the difficulty. I say to the Senator from Kansas I struggled with him in framing these amendments, but I finally came to the conclusion that, whatever our view might be about pre-emptions, that was the law, and these men entered under it, and we must either protect them so that they may perfect their claims under the law as it stood when they made the claims, or we must compensate them for the damages they have suffered. I do not see any other way of dealing with this question, and I think the Senate should adhere to the amendment proposed. Let these men who were entitled perfect their claims under the law as it stood, and not attempt to make new regulations as to how they shall complete their claims.

Mr. PLUMB. That has frequently been done. Within my recollection the law in regard to pre-emptions has been changed in such a way as to affect, and validly affect, the rights, so called, of persons who had located under the law as it had formerly been. By a construction which followed the law of 1841 down until about 1870 the only length of time the pre-emption settler was required to reside on his land before making final entry was thirty days. About 1870 the law was changed, requiring him to reside upon it six months; and the effect of the provision I propose here is simply to require the pre-emption settlers who have located on this land to live there five years in place of six months.

That is undoubtedly perfectly competent for the legislative authority to do. It is in no wise any violation of the right of the pre-emptor. It is, as I said before, consistent with the highest public policy. I believe we ought to permit no settlement upon any portion of the public domain except under the provisions of the homestead law. Whatever we may say about compensation to be paid, no person should be permitted to acquire title to any portion of the public domain except by a residence upon it for a sufficient length of time to settle beyond all controversy, as far as residence can settle the fact, that that man will make the land his permanent abiding place. That a residence of six months now required by law does not do, as the experience of the General Land Office testifies; and if the Senator from Indiana thinks that in addition we ought also to require them to pay a dollar and a quarter an acre instead of 50 cents an acre, I do not think he will find much objection to inserting an amendment to that effect, though I do not think it should be done. The main question here is, Shall we require all these people to live on the land the time required in order to perfect a homestead entry?

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Indiana in connection with the amendment offered by my colleague had occurred to me upon reading the provisions of section 20. As the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana now stands three classes of locations are recognized upon the reservation, by homestead, by pre-emption, or under the town-site act. If I correctly understood the amendment proposed by my colleague as reported at the desk, he proposes, leaving in the language in line 11, to amend the language of line 14 by inserting words which will make the land disposable under the provisions of section 20, which does unquestionably confine the disposition of the remainder of the Sioux reservation to the rights under existing homestead laws, so that by necessary implication individual pre-emption and town-site entries would inevitably be excluded.

It is apparent, therefore, that the amendment offered by my colleague is incongruous, and that it will be ineffectual in accomplishing the result that I suppose he desires and in which I sympathize with him; and that is that this land shall not be permitted to be acquired under the provisions of the pre-emption law or under the provisions of the town-site act, which enable settlers to segregate from the public domain a tract of land to the extent of 640 acres upon filing an affidavit that it is required for town-site purposes.

Mr. President, the safety of this Government depends upon the multitude of small freeholders, and the attention of the people can not be too strongly directed to the fact that we are very rapidly approaching the limits of our public domain; I mean that portion of the public domain that is available for agricultural purposes. At the rate at which the occupation of our territory is now proceeding I doubt whether at the expiration of twenty years from this time there will remain a single acre of land subject to entry under the public-land laws of the United States which will be adapted to the cultivation of wheat or corn; and, therefore, if we desire to preserve our territory for occupation by actual settlers, we can not too early begin to interpose every obstacle that the law may permit against the acquisition of our territory for speculative purposes or its acquisition by monopolists and corporations in large extent for purposes of speculation or of devotion to other than the use of individual settlers.

I should, therefore, be glad to have this bill so amended as to prevent the possibility of the acquisition of any portion of this reservation except under the homestead laws and for actual settlers thereon. But I regret to say, from the examination that was made last summer as to the occupation of this particular territory, that if this bill confines the acquisition of title upon that domain to those who entered upon it in good faith for the purpose of acquiring homes to be occupied and cultivated by them under the homestead and pre-emption laws of the United States, but a very small per cent. of that area will ever be disposed of under the provisions either of the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana or the amendment proposed by my colleague.

Mr. HARRISON. I say to the Senator from Kansas that I will gladly agree to any amendment that proposes to guard against any other than the class he has described getting any of these lands, even if the amount obtained shall be the minimum.

Mr. INGALLS. I was endeavoring to call the attention of the Senate to the condition that exists upon this particular reservation to which our attention is now directed, and I say that if the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana shall be adopted by the Senate it will not operate to protect to any considerable extent the right or the alleged right of those settlers for whom so much concern was exhibited by those who participated yesterday in this debate.

That tract of land is one of the most attractive and best adapted for agricultural purposes, I believe, that is now unoccupied within the limits of the Territory of Dakota, and should the provisions which are proposed by my colleague be added, and the land be disposed of under section 20 of the original bill, it is still to be disposed of at the extremely inadequate compensation of 50 cents per acre.

I believe in fair treatment of our Indian wards, and I am not willing that in the attempt to accommodate the public domain to the desires of those who wish to acquire portions of it, those who are otherwise dependent upon us and who have now the possessory title to this land should be wholly disregarded, and I have no hesitation in saying that the sum which is fixed in section 20 of this bill as compensation per acre for the land in that reservation and in the Winnebago reservation is ridiculously inadequate. If that land were to be put up at public outcry and sold after public notice being given that there should be opportunity for competition, if we are to judge anything from the value of conterminous and contiguous and adjacent territory—for it should not be forgotten that this entire reservation is surrounded and settled by a population that presents an unbroken front in every direction—there is not an acre of it that would not be worth $10 in the market, and that would not be greedily taken at that price if the opportunity were offered. And yet the proposition is made that the homestead laws shall be amended and the title shall be acquired at the rate of 50 cents per acre, payable in four equal annual installments.

The operations of this amendment are not favorable either to the people who may desire to go onto that reservation or the inhabitants of the Territory of Dakota or to the Indian tribes from whom the land is to be taken.

I hope that before final action is taken upon this bill we shall have an opportunity of ascertaining whether there is not some better method for disposing of this reservation than that which is provided either by the amendment of the Senator from Indiana or the provision proposed to be added thereto of my colleague.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to make it read:

And procure title thereto under the provisions of section 20 of this act.

I do not think that is necessary, but perhaps it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, in section 1 of the proposed amendment of Mr. HARRISON, after the word "claims," in line 14, it is proposed to insert:

And procure title thereto under the provisions of section 20 of this act.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think, with all due respect to my colleague, whose judgment is usually good on a question of this kind, that there will be any incongruity in this section if it be amended as I propose, nor will it in any wise conflict with the preceding sections of the bill except in regard to town-site entries. Yesterday, in a conversation with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who has the bill in charge I told him I proposed to amend section 20 by adding the words "and town sites" after the word "homestead," in line 4, and he said that seemed to him desirable, and, as one member of the committee, he would not object. When thus amended the bill will permit all the people who have entered on these lands for the purpose of making homestead, pre-emption, or town-site entries to re-enter on the lands under the provisions of section 20, and by complying with the provisions of that section go on and complete and perfect their entries.

Mr. INGALLS. Will they be entitled to take land as homsteads?

Mr. PLUMB. As homesteads.

Mr. INGALLS. Suppose a man has had one homestead entry already.

Mr. PLUMB. Section 20 does not limit the exercise of the homestead right to those who have not heretofore exercised it.

Mr. INGALLS. Do you permit a duplication of homesteads?

Mr. PLUMB. To that extent. This then makes one simple form of entry of all these lands thus opened to settlement, and that under the homestead law.

Now I want to say something about the price of these lands, as my colleague has dwelt upon it and the policy of the Government with reference to that price. The Government has for the last forty years practically recognized itself as a trustee without pecuniary interest in the public domain. The homestead law was the culmination of that theory. The public lands are, in theory at least, held for the benefit of the class of people who are not able to pay what the lands might commercially be worth, and the policy has been to encourage their sale to this class of people.

What my colleague says about the lands in this reservation as to their value is equally true, and has been for many years, of almost the entire State of Kansas and other of the public land States and Territories. Millions of acres are entered every year under the homestead law that are worth from one to five and ten dollars an acre, and other millions of acres of land are entered under the pre-emption law for which a dollar and a quarter per acre is paid which are worth from two to five times what the settlers pay for them. These lands have most largely gone into the hands of those who but for this policy could not have obtained lands for homes.

I think in this way the highest good has resulted; far greater indeed than would have been the case if the lands had brought all they were worth in money, and by reason of being thus sold had been kept from the possession of those who have been able to obtain them under the beneficent policy of the Government.

I believe this general policy of the Government should be observed as near as may be in opening the Sioux reservation to settlement. As to the compensation provided for in this bill being inadequate and unjust to the Indian, we all know that the courts have recognized the Indian as having only a possessory right. We are not acquiring from the Indian by this bill the fee, for the reason that he has not got it to sell. We are paying him 50 cents per acre simply for his right of possession. If I was to express my own candid opinion on this subject, I would say that the price proposed to be paid is too great, and that we are endowing the Indians with wealth to which they are not entitled and of which they can never make any good use and the possession of which will be a stimulus to cupidity and avarice in all our dealings with them in the future. An Indian tribe with a vast sum of money will inevitably be demoralized and be the subject of rapacity on the part of their neighbors.

If, instead of paying them this 50 cents an acre, we had settled them in the exercise of our undenied power upon such portions of the reservation as they were competent to occupy and to cultivate as they ought, and had made some useful and sensible and comprehensive provision for their maintenance for the time being and for the giving to them of stock and farming implements and instruction in agriculture for a period of years, we should have done much better for them, I think, than will ever be accomplished for them under the provisions of this bill.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], familiar with this subject, calls my attention to the fact that we are reserving for the members of this tribe nearly 4,000 acres for each family of six, an amount which they can never make proper use of, a body of land unnecessarily large and beyond their capacity to use. This bill, instead of leaving them twelve or thirteen million acres, as it does, should have taken away at least 6,000,000 acres more, and I think it would be better if we would take away $10,000,000 more, and leave them a quantity which they might be supposed at least to cultivate as a means to a livelihood.

This bill is liberal to the Indian. It is not only liberal to the Indian, but it is so liberal that it will be a fruitful parent of trouble from the very moment of its enactment on through twenty, thirty, and perhaps fifty years of coming time.

The land which we open to settlement will not be settled upon fairly until we shall be called upon, and justly, too, to subject more of this reservation to settlement. We shall not more than enter on the expenditure of the enormous sum of money we are to derive from the sale of this land until we shall be confronted with all sorts of projects for its extravagant expenditure. We are opening the door to trouble; we are temporizing with this question, as we always have done, doing to-day only the things that we are compelled to do, totally regardless of what to-morrow will bring of its duties and of its obligations.

I shall consent to this bill when properly amended, reluctantly, because I am advised by the authority of the Indian Committee that something of this kind must be done now in order to effectuate even a partial settlement of the difficulties existing in Dakota. It is not what I would have proposed, but there has been adopted the principle, unwisely I think, of appealing to the individual Indian for his consent, and he has been told by the authority of a committee sent out there for that purpose by Congress that a measure substantially of the kind now before us would be adopted by Congress and submitted to him for his approval, and we are told that we must take this now or that all that work must be thrown aside and nothing be done perhaps for many years to come.

I think it was a mistake to say that to the Indian—to make him such a proposition. I think it was a mistake to appeal practically to Indian suffrage on this question. Congress ought to have legislated wisely and justly and thoroughly upon this subject, as it has ample power to do, without going through the form of an appeal to the Indian himself, to whom judgment is a mere whim, and whom to consult in the way proposed is simply to give an inordinate idea of his own importance. But, as I said, I propose to consent to it when it is properly amended, leaving the Indians in possession of this vast estate and imposing on the hardy settlers who shall go upon the lands we open to settlement by this bill the burden of paying to the Indians more than they are entitled to for what they relinquish, because for the time being it is the best that can be done.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the objection urged by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to this bill seems to me to proceed on a misconception of the true condition of the claim of the Indians to this land. As has just been said, these Indians are not the owners of this land. They are but the occupiers, with a possession of a certain character recognized by the United States heretofore in all its dealings with the Indians as of a monetary value, but it has never been the policy of the United States to recognize the Indian as entitled to the full moneyed value of the land held by him in possession.

As I said the other day, when speaking upon this bill, these Indians formerly roamed and controlled practically the territory now covered by Western Kansas, by Colorado, by Western Nebraska, by nearly or all of Dakota, and by a portion of Wyoming. We have already by treaty with these Indians paid them more money than we paid for the Louisiana purchase, and if we continue the policy already inaugurated we shall have paid them, when we conclude, several times the amount of money that we paid for the entire Louisiana purchase; and that, too, without any benefit whatever to the Indians.

When the last treaty was made in 1868 we treated with these Indians with an express reservation on our part of the right to put other Indians upon these lands, to compel them to divide these extensive reservations with other Indians if that should be the judgment of the United States. That can be found in the provisions of the act of 1868.

I mean to vote for this bill and I shall vote for it with its imperfections and with its objections, because, as has just been said by the Senator who preceded me, it is a step forward, and it opens up a portion of this country to the men who are anxious to make homes upon it. While I admit with the Senator from Kansas that it might be put upon the public market and sold for more money than 50 cents an acre, I would not be willing to sell it and put the money into the Treasury if there was $100 an acre offered for it. I would keep every acre of the public land from this time on for the actual settler, and no person should occupy any portion of it, so far at least as I am concerned, unless he made a home upon it.

We reserve for the twenty thousand Indians now in that reservation 13,320,000 acres of land. We reserve 666 acres for every Indian, big and little, small and great. We reserve for a family of six 4,000 acres lacking 4. The right of the General Government to reserve and relegate to savagery—for that is what we are doing—this vast extent of territory may well be controverted and may well be denied; but we get I believe by this bill about 11,000,000 acres, and that is worth something, and the next step may bring us a little nearer to bringing these Indians down to a reasonable amount of land that they ought to occupy. Have Senators thought what a vast extent of country they are locking up by this bill, locking up too for twenty-five years by patents that neither the Indian nor the Government can sell? There could be made of this country eighty-three thousand farms of 160 acres each. That is reserved for these twenty thousand Indians who, if the past is any criterion to judge of what they will do for the next generation, will not cultivate 10 acres per capita.

Mr. President, I propose before we get through to offer some amendments to the bill. I shall vote for the bill even as it is, for I am satisfied, notwithstanding you may put in it a provision that this land shall be kept there for twenty-five years, some method will be devised to unlock and to withdraw from this isolation a portion of this public land.

The other day, when I discussed this question briefly, I could not hear accurately the reply of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on account of the noise in the Chamber. When I looked at the RECORD the next day I saw that I had been charged with advising the violation of a treaty. Why, Mr. President, I have never advised the violation of a treaty on this floor. I have advised the abrogation of Indian treaties, and I trust it is not necessary in the Senate of the United States for any man to explain the difference between the violation of a treaty and its abrogation.

What I complain of at all times is that the Government of the United States persistently, uniformly, and continually violates its treaties. Treaties that it can not enforce and can not obey it has not the courage to abrogate—a right that every government retains to itself when it makes a treaty with the smallest nation or the greatest. Whenever in the interest of the public service its abrogation is required the right exists, and I never saw in the course of my reading a charge upon a nation that it was contrary to law, contrary to morals, for a government to abrogate a treaty. But I do say that it is contrary to good morals for a country to live day by day in the violation of its treaties. I say, having made treaties impossible of execution, having made treaties that are contrary to the interest of the Indian and the white man alike, it would be a brave and an honest thing for the Government to take the proper step and abrogate such treaties, and then see that justice and right were done; but they never will be done while these treaties are pending.

As the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] has said, we have appealed to the individual Indian, and we have put a provision in this bill that the Indians may veto, if they see fit, national legislation—a power denied to the States, denied to our own citizens, to everybody except the President in a constitutional manner. We say to these Indians ignorant of the character of this treaty, ignorant of what they are doing, "If you decline to assent by three-fourths of your numbers this bill shall go for naught." I know the provision of the twelfth section of the treaty of 1868, never put there by Indians, never put there by a man acquainted with Indian law, never put there at the request of an Indian, big or little, but contrary to Indian policy and contrary to Indian law, submitted to by the Indian becaused he supposed that it was something the Government desired, not because he supposed it was for his benefit or for his interest. No Indian nation has ever acted upon the theory that the masses of the Indians should have a vote in its councils or its proceedings. It acts by its chiefs and headmen and principal men; and to-day you can go there and get three-fourths of these Indians to agree to this or to any other proposition when you have the headmen and the chiefs assenting thereto. It is a useless provision; it is worthless for any practical purpose for protecting an Indian; it is contrary to good law, and it is contrary to Indian law and Indian policy.

I would abrogate every Indian treaty we have ever made. I would commence and legislate with honesty and with intelligence with reference to this great question; and when, as I said the other day, the American Senate and the American House of Representatives are compelled to legislate independently of the wishes or the will of the Indian, there will not be put upon the statute-book such legislation as has gone there year after year. We submit the question to the Indian where he will go; he proposes to locate where it suits his convenience, not with reference to the future, but to the present. We submit the question to him whether he will educate his children, and if he declines to educate them, we admit that this great nation is without the power to compel it, and we can not compel it unless you require him to agree by treaty, or unless you abrogate the treaties already made.

The Government of the United States need not be delicate about the protection of treaties, for there can not be found, I think, upon the statute-book in the entire range of Indian legislation a single act where I can not point out to you an infringement or violation of treaties, violations, too, in all their fundamental and essential particulars, violations in everything that particularly affects the Indians, full of things that are useless to him and valueless to us; and that is the character of the legislation that has prevailed in this country for the last fifty years. As I said the other day, and I said it knowingly, if the enemies of this race had dictated the legislation it could have been but little worse than it has been, could have been but little better calculated to destroy and keep them in their present condition than it has been. What I want to do and what I insist upon is, not to violate the statutes, but to abrogate treaties and then legislate for their good as we legislate for our own citizens. Shall we say that we are incapable? Shall it be said that the American Congress is not big enough to grapple with this question? It has been presented to us in a thousand ways by men devoted and earnest, who have studied it from time to time, and yet we are too ignorant to legislate unless we consult these ignorant poor people who know not what they want, and who are determined not to receive that which we insist is for their benefit and which we know is only for their protection and their salvation.

Mr. President, you may give them land by the league, you may give them food, you may give them clothing, but they will be Indians until you compel them to come under the laws of the land and to obey and respect the laws and give them the protection of the laws. You can not induce many of these tribes to put their children in school who ought to go. You may put their males, but many of them have declined to allow their females to go to school. It is the female Indian who should be put in school whether the Indian wills it or whether he does not. She should be put there and taught to do the work of a housewife, because it is an admitted fact everywhere that the mothers have more influence over the coming generation than the fathers, and we have failed very generally to reach the Indian woman, while we have endeavored to raise the Indian man. You may bring up all the Indian tribes until they get to be Solons, if you please, and if you leave the Indian women in degradation, in ignorance, and in vice you will have the next generation of the character of the mothers.

I have before the Senate a bill for compulsory education. I have not any doubt that it will never receive the assent of this body, because it will be said it is in violation of existing law; it is in violation of treaties made, by which they are to send, if they choose, their children to our schools.

Mr. President, there is but one method out of this difficulty. I have repeated it before, years ago, in the Senate Chamber; I repeated it when it became my duty to study this question with more care than I had before; and I repeat it now after the experience I have had; and that is, to put the Indian children into manual-labor schools and educate them, not simply in books, but educate them to blister their hands in honest toil, and then make them citizens of the United States, giving to them all the protection of the law and demanding from them the respect to the law which we demand from every other portion of our people.

Mr. DAWES. If this bill ever reaches port it will be by a perilous passage between Scylla and Charybdis—those on the one hand who are disposed to deprive the spoiled Indian of his possessions and appropriate them to the use of the white man, and those who are disposed rigidly to regard his rights under treaty stipulations and to yield nothing in this legislation that would not be a fair and proper compensation to the Indian in treating between man and man. The bill is an attempt to compromise between these two conflicting forces. They have been contending with the Indian for more than fifty years, and in all that contest he has always been the sufferer. No man has described it with more accuracy and truth than a clear-headed Indian himself described it to a committee of this body when he said that there never came a commission or committee to talk with the Indian that the Indian, when he went away, did not miss something.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] do not accurately describe this proceeding when they say that we reserve for the Indian unnecessarily large tracts of land. A more accurate description of it would be to say that we omit to take from him large, and it may be unnecessarily large, tracts of land. Both of these Senators have asserted here that the Indian does not have any title to any land in this country except a possessory title. I do not understand the decisions of the Supreme Court in that way.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inject into the remarks of the Senator the suggestion that I never made any such statement. I made that remark with reference to this reservation. There are reservations where the title is practically given in fee by the Government without a patent. There are a great many tribes that have patents. I was referring to this particular reservation, where the fee is not recognized at all.

Mr. DAWES. I do not propose to omit to take notice of what the Senator said in reference to this particular reservation, but I desire to say here that I have never seen in the adjudications of the Supreme Court the doctrine laid down that the title of Indians to land was only a possessory title. I understand them to say that the original right of Indians to land in this country was only held as a possessory title. But a treaty title is not governed by any such law as that; it is measured by the language of the treaty itself, and is just as much a title, taken by the words of the treaty, as grants are, to all intents and purposes, a grant of title to those who are the beneficiaries under the treaty, and the treaty is to be construed in reference to title precisely as a patent or a deed is to be construed, and the title is to be measured by the words of the treaty. A treaty title is one thing; the original title of the Indians is another thing.

Now, sir, let us measure this title; let us look at this title. The Senator says we expressly reserved the right, when we gave these people this land under this title, to put other Indians there and to occupy this land with other Indians whether they would or not. I do not so read this treaty. I understand, on the other hand, that it was expressly limited to such Indians as these Indians consented to take and make a part of their body. This is its language:

> And the same is set apart for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of the Indians herein named, and for such other friendly tribes or individual Indians as from time to time they may be willing, with the consent of the United States, to admit among them; and the United States now solemnly agrees that no persons except those herein designated and authorized so to do, and except such officers, agents, and employés of the Government as may be authorized to enter upon Indian reservations in discharge of duties enjoined by law, shall ever be permitted to pass over, settle upon, or reside in the Territory.

If I understand anything about the law I understand that if a person grants to another and his heirs the exclusive use and occupation of his land forever—this uses the word "forever"—he grants to him the fee, because he grants to him all the use to which that land can be put, and the decisions of the courts and the common law of the world give to such a grantee the fee of the land to him and his heirs forever. This is to these Indians forever. Of course it means for them and their heirs.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether, if the Indians should abandon this land, he thinks it would still be theirs in fee? Would it be their property as effectually and fully as if it had been conveyed by deed?

Mr. DAWES. I do not understand that the Indians on their part covenanted to make any particular use of this land. I understand that the United States has set it apart and agreed that no white man shall ever cross over it, but that it shall be kept for their use and occupation for all time to come.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he does not find the provision I suggested in the act of 1868, that the Government might settle other Indians upon this land?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator did not hear me read that clause. It expressly provides that it shall be with the consent of these Indians.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly, with their consent as to the character and class of Indians to be settled, but it shows that the Government did not intend to recognize them——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JACKSON in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator's colleague has put me under bonds in reference to the consideration of the other bill. I feel that if I should give way he would have a right to object.

Mr. DAWES. I will settle with my colleague if I am allowed a word further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is before the Senate.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union, and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln.

Mr. BUTLER. I move now formally the adoption of the amendment I had the honor to offer some days ago and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, which is: "Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:"

That the inhabitants of the Territory of Dakota are hereby authorized to form for themselves a State government, with the name of the State of Dakota, which State shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That the said State of Dakota shall consist of all the territory included within the boundaries of the present Territory of Dakota.

SEC. 3. That all persons residing within the limits of said proposed State, qualified by the laws of said Territory of Dakota to vote for representatives to the Legislative Assembly thereof, are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form a convention; and the qualifications for delegates to such convention shall be such as by the laws of said Territory persons are required to possess to be eligible to the Legislative Assembly thereof; and the aforesaid delegates to form said convention shall be apportioned among the several counties within the limits of the proposed State, in single districts, in proportion to the population in each of said counties and districts, as near as may be, to be ascertained at the time of making said apportionment, by the persons hereinafter authorized to make the same, from the best information obtainable; that said apportionment shall be made by the governor, the chief-justice, the associate justice for the first judicial district, the associate justice for the third judicial district, and the United States attorney of the Territory of Dakota, or any three of them; and the governor shall, by proclamation, order an election of the delegates aforesaid to be held on the day of the regular annual election in November, 1886, which proclamation shall be issued at least sixty days prior to the time of said election; and such election shall be conducted, the returns made, the result ascertained, and the certificate to persons elected to such convention issued in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of the said Territory regulating elections therein for Delegate to Congress. The number of delegates to said convention shall be one hundred and seventy-five; and all persons resident in said proposed State who are qualified voters of said Territory, under the laws thereof at such time as the constitution to be framed shall be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection, shall be entitled to vote upon the question of such ratification or rejection, under such rules and regulations as said convention may prescribe.

SEC. 4. That the delegates to the convention thus elected shall meet at the city of Bismarck, the capital, on the second Tuesday of December, 1886, and, after organization, shall declare, on behalf of the people of said proposed State, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said proposed State: Provided, That the constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: And provided further, That said convention shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, first, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; secondly, that the people inhabiting said proposed State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within the boundaries thereof, and to all lands lying within said limits owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes, until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States, and that the same shall be and remain subject to the disposition of the United States; that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed at a higher rate than the lands belonging to residents thereof; that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States or reserved for its use: Provided, however, That nothing herein, or in the ordinance herein provided for, shall preclude the said State of Dakota from taxing as other lands are taxed any lands owned or held by any Indian who has severed his tribal relations, and has obtained from the United States or from any person a title thereto by patent or other grant, save and except such lands as have been or may be granted to any Indian or Indians under any act of Congress containing a provision exempting the lands thus granted from taxation; but said ordinance shall provide that all such lands shall be exempt from taxation by said State so long and to such extent as such act of Congress may prescribe; thirdly, that the bonded debt of said Territory of Dakota, incurred for the erection of the public buildings of the Territory situated in said proposed State, shall be assumed and paid by the said State of Dakota.

SEC. 5. That in case a constitution and State government shall be formed in compliance with the provisions of this act, said convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held at such time and places and under such regulations as may be prescribed by said convention, at which election the qualified voters of said proposed State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution. The returns of said election shall be made to the secretary of the Territory, who, with the governor and chief-justice, or any two of them, shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes cast shall be for said constitution, the governor shall certify the result to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said declaration, constitution, and ordinances; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, if said declaration, constitution, and ordinances shall conform to the requirements of this act, to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

SEC. 6. That until the next general census, or until otherwise provided by law, said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States, which Representatives, together with the governor and other officers provided for in said constitution, shall be elected on a day subsequent to the adoption of the constitution, to be fixed by said constitutional convention; and until said State officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution the Territorial officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices over the territory within the said proposed State.

SEC. 7. That sections numbered 16 and 36 in every township, and where such sections or any subdivision thereof have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter-section, and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken, are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools.

SEC. 8. That when the State of Dakota shall be admitted into the Union in accordance with the provisions of this act, fifty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located by the direction of the Legislature thereof, and with the approval of the President, on or before the 1st day of January, 1887, shall be, and are hereby, granted, in legal subdivisions of not less than one-quarter section, to said State for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State for legislative, executive, and judicial purposes, in such manner as the Legislature may prescribe.

SEC. 9. That so much of the lands belonging to the United States as has been acquired and set apart for the purpose mentioned in "An act appropriating money for the erection of a penitentiary in the Territory of Dakota," approved March 2, 1881, together with the buildings thereon, be, and the same is hereby, granted, together with any unexpended balances of the moneys appropriated therefor by said act to said State for the purposes therein designated.

SEC. 10. That ninety sections of land, to be selected and located as provided in section 8 of this act, are hereby granted to said State for the use and support of an agricultural college in said State; and none of the lands granted by this act, or the proceeds thereof, shall be used for any other purpose than that for which the grant is specifically made whatever.

SEC. 11. That all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with 6 sections of land adjoining or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use, the said land to be selected by the governor of said State, within two years after the admission of the State, and when so selected to be used and disposed of on such terms, conditions, and regulation as the Legislature shall direct; and the proceeds thereof shall be devoted exclusively to the support of the common schools of the State: Provided, That no salt spring or lands the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which hereafter shall be confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall by this act be granted to said State.

SEC. 12. That 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State, to be used as a permanent fund for the support of the common schools within said State.

SEC. 13. That all lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be disposed of only at public sale, and at a price not less than $10 per acre, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which only is to be expended in the support of said schools. But said lands may, under such regulations as the Legislature shall prescribe, be leased, for periods of not more than five years, in quantities not exceeding one section to any one person or company.

SEC. 14. That the lands granted to the Territory of Dakota by the act of February 18, 1881, entitled "An act to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming for university purposes," so far as the same have been selected and located in that part of said Territory embraced in the proposed State of Dakota, shall, under the provisions and limitations of said act, be vested in said State: Provided, That none of said lands shall be sold for less than $10 per acre. And such portions of said lands as have been selected and located within the bounds of the Territory of Dakota, as in this act described, shall be vested in said State of Dakota, subject also to the limitations of said act of February, 18, 1881. And there is hereby granted to said State of Dakota so much of the public lands in said State, selected under said act of February 18, 1881, as will give the full amount of 72 entire sections, all of which shall be held and used in accordance with the provisions of the act aforesaid. Said lands shall be selected by the State as provided in section 8 of this act. The section of land granted by the act of June 16, 1880, to the Territory of Dakota, for an asylum for the insane, shall, upon the admission of said State of Dakota into the Union, become the property of said State.

SEC. 15. That all mineral land shall be exempted from the operation and grants of this act: Provided, That if sections 16 and 36, or any subdivision thereof, in any township, shall be found to be mineral lands, or to have been reserved, sold, or otherwise disposed of by the United Satest, the Legislature of said State is hereby authorized and empowered to select, with the approval of the President, any other unappropriated lands in said State of Dakota in lieu thereof, for the use and benefit of the common schools of said State.

SEC. 16. That when the State of Dakota shall be admitted into the Union, the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States; and said State shall constitute one judicial district, to be called the district of Dakota; and for said district a district judge, a marshal, and a district attorney of the United States shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with the same rights, powers, and duties as provided by law for similar officers in other States, except as herein otherwise provided. Said district of Dakota shall be attached to and constitute a part of the eighth judicial circuit; and a term of the circuit court and district court for said district shall be held at the seat of government in said State on the first Tuesdays of May and October in each year; and one grand jury and one petit jury only shall be summoned and serve in both of said courts.

SEC. 17. That the circuit and district courts for the district of Dakota, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties possessed and required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws, rules, and regulations.

SEC. 18. That the district judge appointed for the district of Dakota shall receive as his compensation the sum of $3,500 per annum, payable in four equal installments, on the first days of January, April, July, and October of each year.

SEC. 19. That the marshal, district attorney, and clerk of the circuit and district courts of said district of Dakota, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall for the services they may perform receive the fees and compensation allowed to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties by the laws of the United States, excepting such provisions thereof as are specially applicable to some particular officer or district.

SEC. 20. That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, or that hereafter may be lawfully prosecuted from said court, may be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States; and the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court of the district of Dakota, or to the supreme court of the State of Dakota, as the nature of the case may require; and each of said last-mentioned courts shall, as the case may require, be treated as the successor of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota as to all such cases, with full power to proceed with the same and to award mesne or final process therein; and that from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, prior to its admission as a State, the parties to such judgments shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court of the United States as they had by law prior to the admission of said State into the Union.

SEC. 21. That in respect to all cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district court of the Territory of Dakota at the time of the admission of the said State into the Union, whereof the circuit or district court by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States had such courts existed at the time of the commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts, respectively, shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of said Territory; and all the files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating thereto shall be transferred to said circuit and districts courts, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law: Provided, however, That in all civil actions, causes, and proceedings in which the United States is not a party, such transfer shall not be made except upon the written request of one of the parties to such action or proceeding filed in the proper court.

SEC. 22. That the convention herein provided for shall have the power to provide, by ordinance, for the transfer of actions, cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district court of the Territory of Dakota at the time of the admission of the said State of Dakota into the Union, arising within said Territory of Dakota, to such courts as shall be established under the constitution to be thus formed; and no indictment, action, or proceeding shall abate by reason of any change in the courts, but shall be proceeded with in the State courts according to the laws thereof.

SEC. 23. That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for defraying the expenses of the said convention, and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules and regulations and at the same rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the Territorial Legislature: Provided, That any money hereby appropriated not necessary for such purpose shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, this is a bill which was introduced at the last session of Congress by the Senator from Indiana as the organ of the Committee on Territories, and was passed by this body and failed to be reached in the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator in that connection make the correction that this bill is not that bill, but includes the whole Territory.

Mr. BUTLER. I intended to state that later.

Mr. President, I concede the right of the people of a Territory to apply for admission into the Union when they have reached that condition which entitles them to Statehood. The citation of precedents or authorities is not necessary to prove this. It is admitted by all persons who have given the subject consideration, but I do deny that the inhabitants of a Territory have any inherent or original power in and of themselves to organize a State government. They have none of the attributes of sovereignty while in a Territorial condition except of an inchoate character.

Congress created the Territorial government of Dakota, and exercises as absolute dominion over it as the dominion of a State over its counties, and can abolish or modify the government at its will. Congress alone can authorize the transition from the Territory to a State. In Congress the Constitution and laws have lodged this power, and the exercise of it anywhere else is a bald, naked usurpation, which may lead to a serious conflict of authority, to revolution and bloodshed, and ought not to be sanctioned or encouraged by any department of the Government or any law-abiding people. It may be said, and truly said, the people of Dakota by their action have no such purpose or intention, but I am now talking about the tendencies and possible consequences of such action. Excited party feeling, under the lead of ambitious, unwise, indiscreet men, has ingulfed more quiet communities than Dakota, with all her loyalty and composure, in most perilous and dangerous complications.

Mr. President, this matter of making a State is a very serious business. A sovereign, independent commonwealth—sovereign and independent as to the powers reserved to it by the Constitution—into whose charge the life, liberty, property, and happiness of the citizen are to be committed. It is not a game of chance between political parties, a plaything with which demagogues and reckless men may gratify their unsavory ambition or cliques and rings and cabals ply their unworthy avocations. No, sir; the interests at stake are too great and our responsibility too grave to permit us to waive it in favor of anybody. The architects of our system were master-workmen in the science of government. They erected a structure complete within itself and yet susceptible of almost indefinite expansion. Annex after annex has been added, until it has reached a size many times greater than the original. By whom were these additions authorized to be made by the original founders? By the inhabitants of the Territory out of which the addition is to be established of their own motion and volition? Clearly not. That would be carrying the doctrine of "squatter sovereignty" much beyond the point its most extreme advocates ever contemplated.

By whom, then, I repeat, shall the new State be brought into the Union? I answer, Mr. President, in terms never before denied in the history of the country in the territorial expansion going on for a hundred years; I answer, by the people of the States, through their chosen representatives in the Congress of the United States—the sovereign people of the sovereign States, to whom belongs the materials out of which the new fabric of government is to be built—the people of the States, the masters of Congress, the owners of the public domain, and the source of all power. Into these hands, and nowhere else, the Constitution and laws have committed the power.

And how is it to be exercised? The process is very simple, attended by no complications or political legerdemain or mystery. It is by the passage by Congress of an enabling act empowering the people to erect a State within certain prescribed limits of the public domain to be fixed in the act, and conforming to the requirements laid down in the Constitution and laws for new States and submitted for the final approval of Congress, that they shall be republican in form, not repugnant to the Constitution, &c. That is all, sir. It is very simple—very plain, and easily understood. No need to quibble or gainsay it, for it is the law, and the accuracy and correctness of the statement of it can not and will not be denied.

Let us apply this test to the case now before the Senate. Have the people of Dakota, now demanding admission into the Union, complied with these plain requirements of the law? Has Congress passed an enabling act, and have they, in pursuance of its terms, organized a State government republican in form, and presented it for ratification or approval by Congress? If they have not, then I submit to the candid judgment of every Senator of every and all political parties and opinions whether they ought not to be required to await this indispensable authority before they can become a State? I invite a discussion of the question on a plane higher than that of party politics or party advantage, and plant myself on the invincible stronghold of the law of the case, and if I fail to establish the assertion that the law is as I present it, I give up the contest and support the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Territories.

And, sir, with a view of making the issue clear and distinct and sharp, I have offered a bill, an enabling act, as a substitute for the bill under consideration. I need not explain its terms in detail further than to say it is substantially the bill passed by the Senate at the last session of Congress, and therefore ought to be familiar to Senators. The main difference consists in this, that my substitute embraces the whole Territory, whereas the bill of last session comtemplated a division on the forty-sixth parallel. I have read with care and interest the very able and plausible report of the majority of the committee presented by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] and the bill which accompanies it, and have failed to discover any preliminary authority whatever from Congress to organize a State government in Dakota.

But, say the advocates of this measure, no enabling act or other authority from Congress is necessary, and certain so-called precedents and compacts and guarantees are relied upon in support of this position. Let us examine these and see what bearing they have on the case made. Before entering upon this inquiry, however, I will say, in passing, that I believe Dakota has the essential conditions for Statehood; and further, when she presents herself to Congress in an orderly, constitutional, and legal manner for admission into the Union of States on an equal footing with the other States I will be prepared to aid and welcome her and her enterprising, intelligent population in rising to the dignity of an independent commonwealth. But she must come with a clean record, expressing the free, untrammeled, uncontrolled wishes of a fair majority of her people.

To support the claim of the right of the people of Dakota to set up a State government in the absence of authority from Congress much weight is given to the guarantee of the ordinance organizing the Northwest Territory, which is in the following language:

> And whenever any of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein such State shall be admitted, by its Delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: Provided, The constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and so far as it can be, consistent with the general interests of the Confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000.

The terms of this ordinance, by act of Congress April 20, 1836, were extended to a part of the present Territory of Dakota, and therefore it is claimed her people need not await an enabling act, but having the qualifications prescribed in the ordinance may set up for themselves. That at least is the argument.

It must not be forgotten, however, the ordinance referred to was passed in 1787, and the Constitution was adopted two years later, in 1789, which provides in section 3 of Article IV that—

> New States may be admitted by Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, &c.

So that if any rights are claimed under the ordinance of 1787 they were divested in the organic law of 1789, and are obsolete, the Constitution taking the place of the ordinance in that regard, and the law of this case is that prescribed in the Constitution, not the ordinance.

The Louisiana treaty, ratified in April, 1803, after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, in its third article, provides as follows:

> ART. 3. The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess. (8 Statutes at Large, page 202.)

That part of the Territory of Dakota—much the larger part, by the way—not embraced within the Territory of Wisconsin was acquired from France under this treaty—the Senator from Indiana has kindly informed me that the entire Territory of Dakota was acquired by the treaty from France—and therefore it is urged that the people there have a vested right by virtue of the terms of the treaty which supersedes the necessity of permission from Congress before they can erect a State. The third article, cited above, says they shall be "admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution," &c. The Federal Constitution says:

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union.

And the people have no constitutional or legal right to "erect" a State until "the Congress" confers the power. So much for "guarantees" of the ordinance of '87 and the Louisiana treaty.

And now I invite the attention of the Senate to the precedents relied upon. Precedents, Mr. President, are only available as guides in our official conduct when they are founded in reason and wisdom and illustrate or represent some useful lesson of life or preserve some valuable experience in human affairs. Those now brought forward to justify the action of the people of Dakota, if they bear any analogy to that action, which I deny, would be better "honored in the breach than in the observance." If bad precedents are justified and upheld by repeating them, every usurpation of power, every violation of law, every unsettling of an established order of things, every crime committed would find precedents for their justification and vindication.

I have not the time, nor is it needful, that I should examine in detail the precedents cited in support of this bill—every student of the political history of the country is familiar with them—but shall point out, if I can, some of the points of divergence between them and the case of Dakota. The States of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Maine were carved out of territory belonging to the States of North Carolina, Virginia, and Massachusetts, respectively—three of the original thirteen. They had no enabling acts from Congress, because, by the provisions of the third section of Article IV of the Constitution, the "consent of the Legislatures" of those States was necessary, and, when given, was tantamount to enabling acts, the "consent" of Congress only being necessary to perfect the organization of a State. The case of Dakota is very different.

Now, sir, let us see what was done in the case of Tennessee. I find in a note to the second volume of Poore's Charters and Constitutions this statement, which I take to be true:

> The State of Tennessee is within the limits of the territory granted by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Walter Raleigh, and of the subsequent land grants made by Charles II to the lords proprietors of Carolina. As it became settled, it was recognized as a portion of North Carolina, but the pioneers, as early as 1772, asserted the right of self-government, and the constitution of what was known as the "Watauga" government was the first written compact for civil rule anywhere west of the Alleghany Mountains. A few years afterward, North Carolina succeeded in exercising her rights of sovereignty, and in 1784 she offered to cede her lands west of the mountains to the United States, but the offer was not accepted, and the offer was withdrawn. This led the pioneers to form, for their personal security, a government known as "the State of Frankland." There was an indisposition manifested, however, to rebel against North Carolina, and a "declaration of rights" and "constitution," which were submitted at a convention [see Ramsey's Annals of Tennessee, pages 323–334], were rejected, while the constitution of North Carolina, slightly modified, was adopted. The powers of an independent State government were exercised, however, until North Carolina, by a conciliatory policy, resumed her jurisdiction, and then, February 25, 1790, ceded that portion of her territory west of the mountains to the United States.

What was done in the case of Kentucky, ceded by Virginia——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not understand that that proceeding to which he has just referred in Tennessee for the formation of a State government was the one I was discussing?

Mr. BUTLER. The formation of the State government was in 1796.

Mr. HARRISON. After the cession to the United States, when North Carolina had let go of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; but what I stated is that the condition of the cession from the State of North Carolina, being one of the original thirteen, was that it should be a State, and that was tantamount to an enabling act. The Senator smiles. I shall convince him now that perhaps he will smile in another direction in a moment.

Mr. HARRISON. It was not a scornful smile.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, about Kentucky:

> Kentucky was originally settled by the whites as a colony of Virginia, but after the Revolutionary war the settlers demanded an independent government, under the following provision in the first constitution of Virginia: "The western and northern extent of Virginia shall, in all other respects, stand as fixed by the charter of King James I, in the year 1609, and by the public treaty of peace between the courts of Great Britain and France, in the year 1763, unless by act of this Legislature one or more governments be established westward of the Alleghany Mountains." It was not, however, until after there had been ten successive conventions elected by the people of the "district," and four successive enabling acts passed by the Legislature of Virginia, that Kentucky was allowed to enter the Federal Union as an independent State on an equality with those which had established themselves as a nation.

And the cases of Tennessee and Maine and Kentucky were on all fours. The condition of the cession from those original States was, as I have said, tantamount to an enabling act.

The Government of the United States was then in its swaddling-clothes. Communication between its capital and frontier, of which these Territories were then a part, was slow and difficult, and the protection it could afford precarious and feeble. It therefore became a matter of the last importance to both the inhabitants of the Territories and the Government itself that States should be formed with larger powers than could be enjoyed under a Territorial organization, so that no support can properly be drawn from these precedents for the proceedings taken in Dakota. The conditions and exigencies are different.

But, notwithstanding these exceptional circumstances surrounding these cases, Tennessee's admission was not effected as a matter of course and of right or without challenge. The debates found in the Annals of Congress of that date disclose very decided and emphatic opposition to the methods adopted in that early day, when the guardians of the Constitution and laws were more jealous of an infringement and scrupulous in careful administration than we appear to be.

The observations of Mr. Dayton, in the debate on the admission of Tennessee are full of significance, and he expressed the correct principles with force and accuracy when he said:
